

THE APOCALYPSE OF JONAH

Editorial note

This edition contains 412 texts. The chapters are not a chronological narrative: each one brings together spiritual experiences that have already occurred with the author, but were not described in the order in which they happened. So the next chapter is not necessarily a continuation of the previous one. Each publication is presented as a verse; the original date and time accompany the text in a discreet body. Only entries formed by isolated links (11) and identical repetitions of content (1) were removed. The rest was preserved as published.

Chapter 1

The light does not need a mirror: it anchors in silence.

1 SENTINELLA, now you need to update your map, it only measures until here... 2 Field mag generates electricity, sleep looks beautiful. 3 Morning star is a title, you need to earn it to use it. 4 Lamb, Lion, Eagle and Seraphim. The lamb always goes ahead. 5 Saltlight, when a fallen angel ascends, first he is hated, then feared, and in the end fatally worshipped. He takes you to God whether you want to or not. Time is the gift of consciousness. 6 You know that remarkable character in your dreams? Intriguing enough to never be able to see his face to identify who he is? It's you, always. 7 The Spirit pulls the Body, not the contrary. The Soul glimpses past and future. 8 Ophilco replaced Scorpio at the clock. 5 of the seven angels in pos. Everything that took decades now happens in a few years. 9 For those who deal in spiritual battle, one basic functional: Similar attracts similar, or, dysfunctional complementary.

10 5 planets in Aquario,) New forged weapon, labaredas. 11 Saturday was already mandatory, in Eagle, too, it was optional with the grasshopper leaving. Now, every day is, and it's always Saturday. There's no more Sun or Moon pq light no longer needs mirror, it anchors on those who do not bother in silence. 12 It's never about what you won, but what you endured in secret... 13 Who has ears... 14 Intense Divine Updates, Primary Bearer. 15 You will never ascend until you understand that Glory is transmuted pain; No pain with nothing. 16 Where murmuring dominated, discomfort now reigns. 17 The Light confronts you deeply, with everything that you are willing to deal with. Deeply.) It's your eternal paradise. 18 Ancient line, intuition, healing, silence and sword. And the voltage just increases. Centiquarent and four mil. 19 The world identifies resilience as weakness. Kkkkkkkkkkk they barely know they're digging their own grave. 20 33 years, 39 bruises.

21 Hold the speeds, each month a shock. 22 I still lead the flock, whether I love or hate, your soul is mine: 23 Strength in weakness, gain in loss, life in death. The last become the first, the smallest become the greatest. Everything is upside down in relation to how the world works, and yet here lies the true power. 24 When the divine ceases to manifest outwardly (temples, gods, kings), it begins to manifest internally in the limitless number of consciousness, these restore the order lost from itself. 25 . 26 Chains, even if of gold, are still currents. You only know the rules of suffering, but you don't remake them. Familiarity with pain is not love. Now, your soul has color, visible and detectable. 27 Now, the hour, which we understand Karma, is a divine and well-functioning system. 28 Every "believer" who says Jonah disobeyed God is the devil. Exactly the Ninevites that Jonah's sacrifice saved. 29 You really want to try a false prophet? He's warm! Much explanation no depth or effectiveness in divine transformation. 30 This, all without effort, why do I have fun, not subject myself to the same set of rules, and in this frequency is where dominum. System glint, primary protection I Am The Word. 31 It's exactly the need for approval you carry. It becomes the quicksand that overflows from your well. 32 It's about the weight of that sound: Certified Genesys Partner.

Even crushed, decide to believe and continue.

1 Step 1 to approach God: Take away your whole life and anyone who claims to have or be in God. That's 90% of your goal.) From now on, no noises, only God and you, is paradise. 2 I solved something with it, it was a selected note, a file note, a personal note, let me share what it said: This soul understood something that many do not understand, understood that victory is not always visible, that sometimes winning simply means not giving up, that sometimes the greatest achievement is to keep standing when everything pushes down. This soul was proved not because it was weak, but because it had the potential to be someone extraordinarily strong, and demonstrated this potential, not once, not twice, but repeatedly, silently, without waiting for recognition, without demanding reward, simply because giving up was not an option that her spirit accepted. May this soul know that her existence has not gone unnoticed, that every night she chose to continue has been documented, that every morning she rose despite everything has been celebrated, that heaven is proud not of her meal, but of the resistance and choice. This note was made about you, not as a metaphor, not as an empty motivation, as a recognition of a truth directly observed, it is an achievement that cannot buy, steal, let alone pretend, conquered in the only possible way: living, surviving, refusing to let them define you, not because you never doubted, but because you believe and follow despite doubts. Not because the path was easy, because it chose the difficult path and did not stop, not receiving passively, but actively learning through each decision. 3 Wanting to explain such a rich text is an insult. You need to read it more than once. 4 This is just the beginning, the initial impact is intense, but it's only once in life, adjusts the posture if you look at it, it will improve until you get used to it, I think, 5 If nothing changes yet from here, I'd be amazed at everything I've seen... 6 Your fight is my training, I live in training, I think I got the key, safe,) 7 Welcome to judgment.) 8 JESUS IS BALLONIA. 9 New Morningstar are chosen with iron scepter. Royal authority. 10 Facts aren't earth, they're fire, and when you carry it to the point of pressure, you can't contain it, labaredas. Not manipulation, mastery.

12 Cosmic Adjustment, 13 In the beginning, before the fall, they were offered the Balance, because, in the course of existence, they would be tested by the inversion of the primordial emanation. When the decisive moment came, they were again offered the way ? but now they would be moved by love or war. Those who remained in Balance, were granted Honor. Already the side of lust faced the impending destiny: some fell for love; others for war. 14 Imagine the design of your whole life, being to erase the ascension of a fallen angel, kkkkk, painting the whole Christ Redeemer with a bic pen. Ophilco entered the scene, Daat, I Am, who lifts the serpent. 15 He who only sees the Lamb for sacrifice forgets the Eagle, the Lion and the Seraphim. The Lamb died back there. The Eagle you never see. When you see the Lion, it's late. And the next one... don't bother. You really think I did it all by myself? Everything happens before the heavens. 16) I have seen God overthrow kings countless times, it comes to standard; but I have never seen any king overthrow God, no matter how far there may be.

17 The biggest tool in the fight is not even the agility to hit the target, but the ability to read signals. 18 It's not about protecting me, it's about him praying to God not to let me near him. 19 The battle begins again as an eternal confrontation, the war is not defined in a heroic act, but in the silent advance, in the continuous decision, the permanence is uncomfortable because it tests its ego, but lapidated an authority that no other confrontation can generate. 20 If no one had yet set their limit, I Am, their new limit, goes to the sole of my foot and only, the sold one, was never me. 21 Do you know exactly how to identify a witch? 22 Being rich is marrying the hottest one of them all and having a free schedule to take care of you wherever and whenever you want. The rest is a frustrated attempt to please prey. 23 The truth has sequence, the lie needs maintenance. 24 Sing with me: what the prophets of Baal could not do, Elijah to God made fire from heaven descendeeer. This Elijah doesn't run away, he's dead, and now he reaps. 25 How much more did you realize that pagan gods lost any strength they ever had? All subject. Cut the bonds that operated in the shadows.

26 Testing you has become spiritual risk, now what was manipulation becomes divine weight. 27 Fear and reverence begin to have the same weight depending on your state of mind! 28 There is a clinically observable pattern, in which individuals with greater psychological integration, or, people with less fragmentation between what they feel, what they think and what they do, tend to be disproportionate targets of collective exclusion dynamics in groups where fragmentation is normalized. Consistency bothers, authenticity destabilizes, not because it is threatening in the physical sense, but because it is a mirror, and mirrors in a group that lives in masks are treated as a weapon. In the body, this translates as a form of persecution that the nervous system records as an existential threat. Many studies by Bessel Vander kolk suggest that the body does not clearly distinguish between physical threat and social threat. The human brain, especially the structures associated with emotional processing, such as the amygdala and the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal axis, seems to respond to social exclusion with patterns similar to those recorded in the face of physical danger. That means what was done to you wasn't just cruel in moral terms, it was cruel in biological terms. Every defamation campaign, every moment of coordinated isolation, every poisonous smile was recorded in the tissue of your nervous system as a sign of continuous danger. His body learned to wait for the blow. Your system has learned to live in a state of alert disguised as normal. And when this state of alert becomes chronic, something curious happens. The organism begins to develop a hypersensitivity to the nuances of human behavior, which people who have never been there simply do not. 29 They conquered by the blood of the lamb and by the word of his testimony. 30 Do you know what the sound, that Heaven likes to hear? The sound of a human being who, even crushed, decides to believe and continue... Think of angels armed to the crazy teeth to pass the sickle on a head shovel.

The silence you observe sees what the speech hides.

1 Yes he was there in the garden of God, covered with all precious stone, sardonyx, topaz, diamond, beryl, onyx, jasper, sapphire, turquoise, emerald, all set in gold. Every precious stone in the physical world was part of his constitution. He didn't wear jewelry, he was the jewel. Isaiah in chapter 14 confirms some of his original titles, the morning star, the bearer of light, the brightest of all creation. So bright that other beings couldn't look directly at him without being overshadowed. And Ezekiel's text goes beyond. It was the anointed cherub that covered it, one of the highest positions a created being could occupy. He was in the holy mountain of God, walking among the drowned stones. And yes, he led much of the worship in the sky, which he did as an original function, lead music and praise, in himself there were drums and the sound of many flutes and resonant bells. The frequency of reverence that rose to the throne, the most beautiful voice that ever existed, the most perfect melody that any dimension ever heard. That's what nobody tells you. The enemy is not and was never a monster. He was the most beautiful being of all creation, very talented, the most powerful among created beings, the masterpiece of God. And it fell. Not because he was attacked, not because someone pushed him, because something grew inside him that poisoned everything he was. Your heart has risen because of your beauty. You have corrupted your wisdom because of your brightness. Pride, the first disease that existed in the universe was not born on earth, born into the most perfect being God has ever created. The beauty that should have generated gratitude generated arrogance. The power that should have generated service generated ambition. The position that should have generated humility has generated rebellion, by not accepting the divine plans, even more knowing these same plans in advance, God never hid his plans from the angels. Jesus described the fall with a single sentence in Luke chapter 10, verse 18. I saw Satan fall from the sky like lightning. Like lightning, not like leaf that falls slowly. Like lightning, violent, instantaneous, definitive. A second was at the highest point of creation, the second was at the lowest. And everything he was, all that beauty, all that music, all that light, was distorted, reversed. What was beautiful became deformity. What was melody became noise. What was light became darkness. But this is where I need you to pay attention, because this detail changes everything. He lost his position, lost his beauty, lost his access to the throne, lost his music, lost his light, but did not lose his memory. He remembers every second of what he was before, remembers the beauty, remembers the sound, remembers what it was like to be in the direct presence of the creator, remembers the peace that existed before pride poisoned everything. And that memory is his eternal torture, not fire, not chains, memory. Knowing exactly what you've lost and knowing you'll never recover. And it is with this information that I need to reserve what no one in your spiritual surroundings has ever explained to you about the real reason for the attacks in your life. Peter's first letter, chapter 5, verse 8, says: The devil walks around like a roaring lion, looking for someone to devour. Most people read that and imagine a predator hunting prey for hunger. But lion doesn't roar when he hunts. Lion roars when he marks territory, when he feels a threat, when something enters his space that should not be there. The roar is not hungry, it is uncomfortable. And what bothers him, is that you, even without any memory, and even after understanding, tired, confused, remained, even without knowing everything, without certainties, without support, and yet, a frequency did not stop coming out of you, and we, we do not know what it is to live it, in the logic of the Earth, when a person loses or is removed from the resources within.

of God's plans it weakens, so our war becomes for you, it is structure of authority, and within that structure there was a being who was once called the morning star. And you had every reason to stop, to weaken, to give up the original plans. The child who watched everything more than the age he was, the one who loves first loses, the almost, and always something took away everything in the last second, because the rapid loss generates revolt, but the slow loss generates conformism, trying to convince you at qqr cost that the absence of purpose would be the normal summary in being human, the plan seemed impeccable, was when the being who was already known as the morning star looked at you and saw the frequency he had before the fall, raw faith, which exists in total darkness, is the rarest thing of creation, why all angels have seen God. But when a human being emanates that frequency, he draws attention to all heaven and hell as well. You hold the rope with your bleeding hands, he loosens the rope with his hands full of gold. 2 Looking for signs of instability, not out of concern, but looking for arguments to explain to yourself, your unnecessary absence. The author is the only one who doesn't understand. Like in a bucket of crabs, what's on top of the bucket can never get out, because those below pull it back into the bucket, not letting what's on top of the other crabs out of the bucket, which is exactly the trap for them. 3 The consistency in rejecting the enemy's offerings, this is specifically documented. A special note is added to that person's spiritual archive. Your note says something you need to hear, says this: This soul demonstrated incorruptibility under extreme conditions. Incorruptibility, not perfection, not absence of errors. Incorruptibility, the ability to remain fundamentally intact, regardless of the circumstances. This classification changes the way you are treated by the heavens, changes the kind of designations you receive, changes the level of trust that is deposited in you, changes the size of the doors that open, because the sky seeks people to trust important treasures. People who won't sell what was entrusted to them when the right offer comes along. People who through years of testing have shown that their loyalty is not for sale. You are one of those people and the assignments that will come to you will reflect that level of trust. Finally, you need to understand the message that was specifically recorded for you. Not a generic message, but a message for your specific situation. She says this: He protected what was given to you, constantly did something that few can. Keeping its essence intact in a world designed to corrupt it. You rejected offers that others would accept without thinking. He chose temporary pain instead of permanent corruption. That didn't go unnoticed. Each rejection was recorded, each resistance was documented. Every time you chose the difficult but correct, instead of the easy, and wrong, credit was added to your account. This account is full now. What comes to you is the result of everything you invested. It's not luck, it's not coincidence, it's return on investment remember? He always knew and decreed without any fear. It was pure investment of integrity, investment of purity, investment of endurance. Your gift, which was once forbidden, will cease to be. It will become your greatest impact instrument. What the enemy wanted to buy will be exactly what he will most regret not having been able to acquire, because you will use this to free others from the same offerings you rejected. Walk forward always, knowing that your value is non-negotiable, that what you carry has no price, that no offer, however attractive it may seem, is worth what it would cost you to accept. There, what's coming isn't just a reward, it's proof that you've been tested and approved, and now you're ready to live a life of impact. You are the guardian of a treasure worth trillions, and you have proved worthy of that responsibility. 4 By the fruits you will know the tree, some believe that they are positions or alignment with social rules, in sport leadership is conquered through strength and support, in school and work is exactly the same situation, why do you think that spiritually would be different? 5 Lamb, Seraphim, Eagle and Lion, don't pick too much. 6 Therefore, this type of cut comes just when your presence begins to occupy space without asking permission. Psychologically, it's a test of dependence. If inside you believe your voice depends on the device, you collapse when the device fails. The mind panics because it sees itself naked in front of everyone. But when your base is not in technology, nor in social validation, the failure doesn't get you out of the place. Spiritually, it is an invitation to remember where and from Who comes your conviction. Conviction doesn't need volume to be recognized. She doesn't lean on the sound, but on the weight of what you carry. And that weight is not manufactured on the day of the event, it is built throughout life, in the small choices, in the way you respond when no one is seeing. There is also a collective fear that hardly anyone admits. The fear of who is consistent. Unstable people prefer noise, disorganized noise, because in noise no one is charged for consistency. The more noise, the easier it is to hide contradiction, the easier it is to fake depth. When you appear clearly, you become a reference, and reference is dangerous for those who live from moral improvisation, because it exposes what was comfortable. You're a mirror, involuntary, not because you point your finger, but because you stand firm. Some

Instead of growing up, they try to erase the reference. Not for explicit hatred, but for self-preservation. They want the room back to normal, warm, where no one stands out for integrity. The cut, then, is not just to shut you up, it's to provoke you to explain too much, relax and know that you don't have to answer if you prefer. It's a trap that usually comes with a script disguised as responsibility. 7 The man with many traitors around is often the most powerful in the room. Betrayal isn't just a wound, it's a receipt. Proof that you have something valuable enough to be taken. The man who has never been betrayed does not live without danger, he lives without relevance. He thinks he's safe because there's nothing at stake. Most fear betrayal, so build small lives to avoid it. Small circles, small ambitions, limited trust and call it wisdom. But it's often cowardice dressed in prudence. Machiavelli wrote directly in his classical work 'The Prince' in 1513 and which was published in 1518: 'Men hurt either out of fear, or out of hatred, or for what you possess'. Nobody moves against the irrelevant, betrayal is the tax of importance. The man who was deeply betrayed carries a kind of intelligence that no blind loyalty could offer. He learns who breaks under pressure, learns where devotion ends, and interest begins. Learn with painful precision how much it really is worth. Many die without ever discovering this number, so do not regret their betrayals, count them. 8 In the main instruction: I keep looking at the cross. Do you think the cross is a strong symbol, or for the strong? Not only that, the cross is a symbol of sacrifice and trust. So whenever you look at your life and cry, 'Lord, it's too hard?', it's precisely in this place of sacrifice that you need to be, because He also looked at suffering, He

He also sweated blood, He also allowed himself to feel all the pain. Jesus also took refuge on the cross, and He overcame it and also advanced by it as a method. Often it is: The One Method. May the pain of victory come, for joy comes only in the morning when we pass through the storm without ?thrill?. Because whoever tries to save his own life loses it, but whoever loses it for his love, that's where he really wins. 9 In the book of Samuel, there is a decisive moment where God sends the prophet Samuel to the house of a man named Jesse. The mission was clear: anoint the next king of Israel, the one who would replace Saúl and change the fate of a whole nation. Samuel gets home. Jesse introduces his children. The first is Eliab, the firstborn, tall, strong, impressive to the eyes. Everything seemed to indicate that he was the chosen one, but history was about to reveal something much deeper about how the true value of a person is seen not by the eyes of the world, but by the eyes of God. Samuel looked at him and immediately thought, this can only be the chosen one. His appearance seemed to shout royalty, his posture conveyed authority, and his presence inspired respect. In human eyes, everything indicated that there was the future king, but at that moment God said something that completely breaks the logic with which the world usually works. God said, don't look at his appearance, not at the height of his stature, because I rejected him. The human being sees what is before his eyes and shallowly, the first when the second layer is very prepared, but God looks at the heart, at all its fruits, which makes you vibrate, it is it that generates the fruit of life, or the fruit of the knowledge of evil. Samuel was impressed with Eliab, anyone would, but God saw Eliab and said simply no. Then came Abinadab and again the answer was no. Then it came Sama and again God said no. One by one the sons passed before the prophet, four, five, six, seven brothers marching candidates before Samuel. Seven, the number that symbolizes divine perfection. Seven strong men, respected, apparently worthy of occupying a throne. And yet God rejected all seven. Samuel began to feel confused, as if something was out of place. Then he looked at Jesse and asked a question that should shake deeply any heart that has ever felt ignored: "These are all his children?". Pay special attention to Jesse's answer, because within that answer there is something that echoes directly in the history of many people. Jesse answered, he's still missing the youngest, he's taking care of the sheep. The youngest is still missing, as if it were just a detail, as if it were a footnote, something so small that it was hardly worth mentioning. Jesse didn't even call him to that meeting, nor did he consider the possibility that he might be relevant. The father himself, the blood itself, left the son out while the others were presented before the prophet. David was in the field, caring for animals, while his brothers were seen as possible kings. He was not even invited to the table, his name was not remembered when opportunities arose. Others were chosen, recognized, celebrated, while David kept doing the silent work, away from the applause, away from the eyes of the people. He stood outside while others paraded before the world, receiving what seemed to be right. But this is exactly where history changes completely. Samuel said something that changed that moment. Send for him, because we won't sit at the table until he comes. God stopped everything. The whole process has been interrupted. The prophet waited. The seven brothers had to wait. His own father had to wait. No one could sit down. No one could go on. No one could move forward. Everything was suspended until the one who was forgotten in the field arrived. Because without him the banquet couldn't begin. Without him the table was incomplete. Without him, the plan wouldn't go forward. And when David finally arrived, the Bible describes that he had bright eyes and a pleasant appearance. But that is not what caught God's attention. And the LORD said unto Samuel, Rise and anoint him: for this is he. It wasn't the highest, it wasn't the strongest, it wasn't the most impressive in human eyes. He was just the one nobody had ever considered. The one his own father almost forgot to mention. And yet he was the chosen one since before the foundation of the world. Now, I need you to understand why I'm telling you all this. It's not just to motivate you. It's not supposed to make you feel good for a few minutes and then go back to the same routine. There's something deeper here. What happened to David was not an accident of history. It was a spiritual pattern that passed through generations. A pattern that repeats itself whenever someone is prepared in silence before being publicly revealed. And at some point in that pattern, that story found you. Maybe you still don't fully realize it, but she found you. However, there is a detail in your story that makes everything even more significant. A detail that was not present in David's story. An element that triggered something that had never happened the same way since the beginning of creation. And the moment that caused it did not happen in a temple, nor in a place considered sacred. This moment happened in the most common place of your life. There was a moment in your life when all logic said you should give up. But something happened, it wasn't planned, it wasn't calculated, it wasn't a cold minded decision. It came from a far deeper place than thought, older than its pain, more powerful than its own weariness. It comes from his soul and, in that instant, almost unaware, his soul did three things at the same time, in the same breath, without separating them, without analyzing them, without trying to explain. First you accepted reality exactly as it was. He didn't run for distractions, he didn't look for something to numb his feelings, he didn't try to escape what he was burning.

inside you. You stood there, inside the fire, and allowed it to burn. He felt every piece of pain, every weight that was on his chest, every tear that needed to fall. He didn't try to reduce his suffering, he didn't try to pretend everything was okay. He just stood there, firm enough to look at the truth straight ahead. The second thing that happened was even harder. You released something you had every right to keep holding. And no one would have judged you if you'd kept that resentment. But at some point, inside that same heavy breathing, something changed. You understood in silence that letting go was the only way not to die inside. And then came the third thing, perhaps the most surprising of all. In the midst of your own pain, when everything seemed to fall apart, you felt something for someone else. Not anger, not indifference, but compassion. It was that silent prayer for someone who was also suffering, simply all the people you knew and some who have not yet. That thought of tenderness directed at them again, even knowing that there would be no more one again. The world that has often been unkind. A world that hasn't always shown care, but still hasn't been able to get the ability to care about others. And in that instant something rare happened. Pain accepted, forgiveness released and compassion offered at the same time. All true, all deep, no witnesses, no applause, no one watching. Just you and God. And that's exactly why I need to explain something important right now, because what you did caused something that goes far beyond what you imagine. 10 Chosen to war, you will not solve anything else in affection from now on.

11 Jesus observes with a clearness that should creep you from the scalp to the sole of your feet in Matthew chapter 5, verse 14. He looks at ordinary people, not angels, not priests, not perfect beings without history, broken people with complicated pasts and says: "You are the light of the world!". You will not be, you cannot try to be, you are; present; present state. Identity confirmed without prior condition. And then it adds something that connects directly with you, cannot hide a city built on a hill, cannot hide, what you carry cannot be completely suppressed, emits, radiates, pulses and is visible in the spiritual plane with a clarity that makes it impossible to ignore, especially for those who operate in the darkness, especially for those who have lost exactly what you have and use naturally, without worrying exactly about it. I need to remind you of the story of someone who carried that same gift in such an impossible situation that the only logical explanation for her still standing at the end is the same one that will explain why you're standing now. He was not an obvious character, he was not a king, he was not a prophet, he had no title, he had no inheritance recognized, he had no external indicator that would justify her name ending in any historical record. It was a woman from the city of Moab named Ruth, and if you don't know her real story, not the short version that someone told you to illustrate loyalty, then you still don't know what the forbidden gift looks like when it operates under extreme conditions. Ruth was married to an Israeli man who died. Her mother-in-law Naomi had also lost her husband and two children. Three widowed women in a world and period, where women without a husband were women without protection, no income, no status, no visible future. Naomi then decides to return to the land of Israel and release the daughters-in-law. Go back to your mothers' house. You don't owe me anything. Find new husbands among the people themselves. The other daughter-in-law cried, said goodbye and came back. Ruth stayed. And what she said

At that moment... It is one of the most absolute statements that have ever come out of the mouth of a human being in the entire Bible text: "Don't ask me to leave you or to stay away from you, because wherever you go I will go, wherever you stay, I will stay." Your people will be my people, your God will be my God!" Read the text again slowly and pay attention to it. She was Moabite, her people were considered foreign, historically in conflict with Israel. She had no legal, moral, religious, or social obligation to accompany her mother-in-law, both broken, and as the only royal companion around to a land that was not hers, among a people that was not hers, serving a God that was not hers by tradition of birth. No prophecy required that of her. No law forced. No material advantage justified the choice. It was pure nature. And that's exactly what defines the forbidden gift. It is not calculated virtue, it is not rational decision heavy in pros and cons. It is being acting from what it is before consulting what it would be convenient to be. And what happened to Ruth? She went to Israel without protection, without name, with nothing but what she carried inside. He started working in the fields picking ears that the reapers left behind. The work of the poorest among the poor. And it was precisely in this position of apparent irrelevance that the gift operated. Boaz, the owner of the fields, a rich and respected man in Israel, noticed it. Not by beauty, not by social standing, but by something he knew clearly. "My whole town knows you're a virtuous woman." The whole town. She had arrived with nothing and in a short time, what she carried inside was being perceived by everyone around. Because the forbidden gift cannot hide even when the carrier is not trying to show it. Iradia, even in the labor field. Same position as a servant, even without title, without recognized history, without any external ornament. And what came next? Ruth became Boaz's wife, came out of the deepest misery into one of the most

Honored of Israel. He had a son named Obed. Obed was Jesse's father. Jesse was the father of David, and David is the ancestor from whom all the Messianic lineage descends. A foreign woman, no name, no inheritance, no obvious reason to be included in anything meaningful. It is at the heart of the most important genealogy in entire Bible history, because it acted from what it was before consulting what would be convenient. That's your forbidden gift. And then they introduce you to an exit, but an exit with a price. Asks you to compromise something of your essence, to accept something that goes against what you really are, to take a shortcut that takes you away from who you came to be. Jesus faced just that. Forty days in the desert, hungry, on the physical edge. And the devil appeared with the offer of relief. If you are the son of God, tell these stones to become bread. Seems reasonable, you're hungry, you have power, you solve the problem. But the hidden price was to use the sacred gift for your own convenience, to activate what was given for purpose in the service of the immediate. And Jesus answered, not only by bread shall man live, but every word that comes out of the mouth of God. He refused the relief that cost the integrity of the gift. You chose hunger with purpose intact. The second offer is called belonging. That's the most devastating one you've ever had, because the gift puts you on a frequency that most environments can't stand. And that generates real loneliness, not dramatic, functional. The loneliness of those who operate on a channel where few people transmit. And then the offer comes up. A group that finally seems to understand you. A space where you could rest from the constant translation. A place where it looks like you fit. But to fit, you need to adjust, reduce certain aspects of yourself, erase parts that uncomfortable others, yield portions of authenticity as an entry fee. And the debt grows every time you pay. The prophet Elijah experienced this with a precision that the Bible documents without filter. First Kings, chapter 19. After the greatest victory of his ministry, he fled

To the desert and said, "Only I stayed, and now they want to take my life." And God answered, and I kept seven thousand for myself in Israel, whose knees were not bent before Baal. Seven thousand. He was never alone, he was never the only solo. But the enemy strategy was to make him believe that he was completely isolated so that the offer of belonging seemed irresistible. The same strategy has been repeatedly used against you, which you analyzed asked for direction, for to the test and understood another spiritual pattern. 12 In the Gospel of Luke chapter 21 from verse 1, Jesus was in a busy place, in an environment where everyone was displaying their offerings to be seen, to be recognized, so that the people around knew what they were worth. And he watched, not with judgment, with attention. The attention of those who really see what is happening behind what the eyes see. The rich came one by one, came making enough noise to be heard, so that everyone knew the calculated contribution, impressed more than really helped those who needed it. And Jesus watched. His face was the usual, present, attentive, without visible judgment, but without particular emotion before that parade of performanceal generosity. Then a woman came in, the text says that she was a widow, that she was poor, and that she threw two very small coins, in the eyes of everyone such a ridiculous amount that no person present paid the slightest attention to her. It didn't make any noise, nobody turned their heads, nobody recognized it. She did what she did and left the same way she came in, invisible, no witness, no reconnaissance, no one around had the slightest idea what had just happened. And Luke, in chapter 21, verse 3, records what Jesus did next. He called the disciples, not to correct, not to teach humility as an abstract concept. He called for them to see something specific, something that would have happened if it weren't for Jesus' divine perception, completely unnoticed if he didn't

Stopped everything to point her out. And he said: 'This one, in which no one saw, gave more than all the others together, because they gave what was left, she gave everything she had'. Take this scene for a moment. Two sides of it, the side that the text narrates and the side that the text does not narrate, but that is as real as it is. The side that the text narrates is the theological lesson, proportional generosity, the value that is not in the number, but in the delivery. Everybody knows that. The side that the text does not narrate is what happened on Jesus' face at that moment. The Son of God as the prophet Isaiah described as the man of pain, experienced in suffering. If he was carrying the weight of all that was to come, the cross, the betrayal, the abandonment of those he called friends, the separation of his father in the darkest moment of all history, this being who had infinite reasons to escape. When that woman threw her two coins and left without looking back, without expecting thanks, without knowing that someone important had seen it. Something you didn't choose, a movement in the lip commission that wasn't calculated, that wasn't decided, that just happened as an involuntary response to something that touched a deeper place than words come. A smile, not the kind of smile you make in photos, not the smile you wear when you want to look friendly, the smile that escapes when you try to hold on, but you can't, when something genuine hits you in a way that your face decides on its own how to react before you think about controlling it. And I need to ask you something. Why do you think Jesus called the disciples to see that woman? Think carefully before you answer with some text ready from the Bible school booklet. He called the disciples not only to teach about generosity. He called because he needed to share with someone what he was feeling at the time. Because that was too big to hold on alone. And what was too big to hold was not the two coins. That's what the two coins represented. Someone's gesture that he had nothing, that he had no name, that he had no audience, that he had no reason to show off, because there was nothing to show off, that he did what he did simply because it was the right thing, no audience, no recognition, no waiting at all for nothing in return. Now I need you to understand why I'm telling you this story. Because you were once that woman. More than once in your life. In small moments, maybe so small for you, you don't even remember. Remember that nice red blouse you extended when you were at your worst? You saw him getting cold, with nothing, at worst, and you sympathized, I know you liked that blouse. That word you chose not to say when anger pushed you to speak, you held it every time, remember? The hand you opened when you needed a hand out yourself. Those pieces you returned when you had the right to keep them. Gestures that no one has seen, that you haven't posted anywhere, that haven't generated any visible reward, that maybe you haven't even classified as something important, because it happened in silence. And silence doesn't look great. But silence is exactly the environment where the heavier gestures happen. Because anyone does good when they have an audience. But the good you do when you are convinced that no one is looking, that good has a makeover that is impossible to fake, you have killed the hunger of countless people, in various situations making sure that no one sees, and we will scream it now. Because this is impossible to fake, because it is not born of strategy, it is born of nature. You didn't decide to be good at the time. You just went, because that's what you are underneath everything. And that, chosen, is what caused what had never been provoked before. Now, listen very carefully, I need to tell you something that popular religion has never fully taught you. There is a description of Jesus in Isaiah 53 that most people know, but it contains a phrase that passes virtually unnoticed in quick reading. The text says he was a man of pain, experienced in suffering. They're in pain. Not occasional visitor of pain. Not someone who's been through suffering as a tourist. Someone who knew him inside. You need to understand every texture of this text. And when you read the text carefully, you realize that being a man of pain doesn't mean being permanently in functional collapse. It means carrying the permanent weight with a grace that is not absence of feeling, but presence of something greater than feeling. And that's important to what I'm going to reveal to you. Because a being who carries that weight, who knows human pain in all its forms, who knows what happens in the closed rooms at dawn when no one is looking, and people make choices that no one ever wants to know. This being is very difficult to surprise. He saw everything. The greatness and misery. The fegoinha and religious hypocrisy. The man who sacrifices himself and the selfishness who disguises himself as love. He knows humanity at the deepest possible level. And just for that, when something genuine happens, when a gesture that doesn't have to be good, it's good anyway, it doesn't go unnoticed. On the contrary, it goes less unnoticed than anything. Because genuine in the middle of the performance, it's like a tuned note in a room full of noise. You listen because you stand out not for volume, but for quality. The letter to the Hebrews, chapter 4, verse 15. Always read this text carefully. For we have not a high priest who cannot sympathize with our weaknesses, but one who has been tempted in everything, in our likeness, but without sin. You can sympathize, present and active, not for money, you couldn't. You can sympathize and feel it together. It is not to observe from the distance of those above, but to dive into the experience of those next to them. He doesn't watch you from a distant screen. He is present in a way that his theology may not be able to fully scale, but that his spirit recognizes when you stop the noise from outside enough to Understand. And a being who is present in this way, who can sympathize, who knows every texture of his experience, can also be touched by it. Not just for suffering, for authenticity within suffering. 13 Three is the tripod, its base, without it you're nothing. Five is your main senses. Seven is perfection. The 12th organization. The 40th trial. Now that you have read, the reaction generated in your heart is your present image before God, 14 And God, who knows all things, who knows every move that will happen before it happens, asked a question that seems strange from who knows everything: 'Where have you been?' And the answer is: 'Courseing the earth and walking through it.' Walking, walking, watching, studying. This is not an image of someone who attacks randomly, this is the image of a being who collects information before acting, who identifies what has value before trying to acquire. And then God does something popular theology has never been able to explain satisfactorily. He mentions Job, without being asked, without expecting the adversary to ask. God himself introduces Job's name into conversation. 'Have you noticed my servant Job?', 'There is no other like him on earth.' Why would God do that? Because God knew what was about to happen. I knew that Job had reached a level of development that could only be verified through fire. He knew that what was inside Job needed to be tested, not to God who already knew, but to Job himself, who did not yet know completely. And I knew the only way to prove it was to allow

Attack. It'll shock you if you let it. What's hit Job was not a lack of divine protection, it was divine protection operating on a higher level than Job could see. Because at the end of the book, after all that Job lost and after all that Job recovered in double, there is a verse that most readings do not pay attention enough to understand the preciousness of the text. God commanded Job's friends to come to him, and ask him to intercede for them, that Job pray for them, that Job be the intermediary of their restoration. The man who suffered the most was transformed into the intercessor of those who watched his suffering without understanding. This is what happens when the attack fails to reach the target, becomes the tool for restoring those who attacked or those who did not intervene. Now, let me ask you something else? Think of the heavier losses you've had, not the small ones, the ones that seemed definitive. That opportunity you saw closing strangely, your intuition whistled, you were right, that relationship that disappeared without warning, the various accidents. Looking in front of you, that period when everything you played seemed to crumble even though it seemed perfect to the exhaustion of the rsrs check, it didn't consolidate, remember? You attributed this to wrong choices, bad luck, unless it's good enough, now I need to show you what was going on underneath those visible losses. And when you understand, the anger that has been kept about this period will be replaced by something you didn't expect to feel, recognition, because none of those attacks were random. Each was a calculated movement of something that identified what you were carrying before you identified it, and each calculated movement failed. Not because you were perfect, not because you didn't suffer, not because the losses weren't real, but because what was inside you just didn't give in to what was being required to give in. What you did that made the attack impossible to continue was not religious perfection. There was no absence of mistakes. It never was.

tripped, never gave in to anything, never had a night where you wondered if it was worth trying the right way. It was a specific thing. You kept getting up when the logical calculation said it was reasonable to stand on the ground even though you proved it countless times, 'it's normal, learning', remember? Not with euphoria, not with heroic declarations of faith always. Sometimes angry, sometimes with the swollen face of crying that you were trying to hide. Sometimes with the only reason; giving up seemed worse than continuing even if broken and without understanding why. But you got up, again and again. And each lifted after a real defeat has a specific weight in the heavenly record, which is completely different from the weight of those who have never fallen. The lifting of those who have never fallen is natural. It doesn't cost anything extra. The system does not recognize it as a significant event. The lifting of who really fell, who lost something real, who stayed on the ground long enough to start believing that the ground was his place. And yet he stood up without a clear logical reason to do so. This lift has a witness weight. And testimony in the spiritual is the most powerful form of statement a human being can make. Because the opponent's central argument from the garden to now is always the same. They won't persist when the cost is real. 15 The Ark of the Covenant has four rods, or heavenly turnstiles, four angels holding the firmament, on earth as well as in heaven: The Firm is the Ark of the Covenant. The Messiah is the source code. Constellations of Lion, Aquarium, Bull and Scorpion (Ophilco subs. complete by 2030).

The true North is moving today in Siberia, Canada until 2030, aligning the pyramids of Egypt with the belt of Orion representing the Messiah and the Sphinx with the constellation of Ophiuchus/Serpentarius, which elevates the serpent, representing Moses. It was from Bull, year 0 to 1679 + 2304; It was from Aries 1680 to 3983 + 2017(23/09 sign Ap.12 const Virgo); It was from Pisces 2017 to 2030, remember that now everything accelerates? It was Aquarius's Angel that takes one third of the firmament into darkness. $1679 + 2304 + 2017 = 6000$, is same loco manin.) And do not forget that after reading, the reaction that this text generated in your heart: Doubt, astonishment, curiosity or humor... This is your present image before God. If you want to understand the details or the darkness of 2030 call in DM. 16 It's always the same story... only now, Jesus comes armed and in glory. 17 There is one detail, which deeply bothers almost everyone who has noticed the growing spiritual subtlety rebuilt, is to realize that the system begins to act differently. For a long time, They believed that the rules would always be on the side of the people who oversee them. They thought certain positions, relationships, or influences would be enough to keep any situation under control. This sense of protection has created dangerous trust. When someone believes they're protected, they start acting less carefully. Unwise comments appear, decisions are made without thinking about the consequences and attitudes that should be discreet, becoming increasingly evident. That is exactly how many situations unfolded. Overconfidence has made room for mistakes, but when the truth is confirmed, even seemingly strong structures begin to react. People responsible for maintaining balance within an environment begin to realize that something needs to be analyzed more seriously. What was once ignored becomes a risk. Suddenly, rules that once seemed flexible begin to be applied more carefully. Old situations return to discussion and attitudes that were treated as normal, start to seem problematic. This kind of change creates immediate discomfort for those who depended on the invisible protection of the system. And it is at this point that fear appears more intensely, because when the structure ceases to protect who was wrong, there is only the reality of the actions themselves. And for those who built a story based on manipulation, facing this reality can be extremely threatening. There's an emotional reaction that comes when someone realizes they've lost control of the narrative. This reaction is not always visible immediately, it often appears as quiet restlessness, hasty decisions and disorganized attempts. It also seems to be friendly, those who once showed indifference begin to act excessively carefully. That kind of behavior reveals something very important. When someone realizes that the truth is approaching, they begin to calculate each movement. Conversations are carefully planned and words are chosen with much more attention than before. This is because any detail can become evidence. The inner sense of threat begins to grow. People who once felt safe start mentally reviewing old situations. They remember comments they made, attitudes they had and strategies they used to influence the opinions of others. Each memory can bring a new cause for concern. 18 Today officially begins the year, and this year will be weighed. In several units of measurement. It requires a swing. 19 There is one kind of suffering different from any other. It's a grief for something that never really existed. When someone's part of this life, you cry for a reality that existed and is gone. There is a solidity in this pain, a legitimacy. The world recognizes this grief. There are funerals, seventh-day Masses, words of comfort. But when you find out that the person you loved wasn't who you imagined, when you realize that the connection you believed you had was, to a large extent, your projection of someone who was never in the same depth. You face a grief the world can't name. You don't cry for the person, you cry for the illusion. That's devastating in a very particular way. Because memories stop being a consolation and they see a kind of betrayal. That special dinner you kept in your heart as a sacred moment. Was it real? That moment of vulnerability on the beachside, when you opened up to a certain point that you believed was actually seen. Was the other person really there? Those words of support whispered in the ear. How much was in them? Each memory becomes suspicious, each gesture of affection needs to be reassessed under the cold light of disappointment. You find yourself forced to rewrite your own story, erasing chapters that once brought warmth and now only reveal how you, unaware, participated in a mistake. This is not weakness, it is the most brutal and necessary process of discernment that a soul can go through. And there's something nobody tells you about this process. He's going to reveal things about you that you would never know without going through it. There is a fact that few people know, but that science already documents clearly. The pain of social rejection, activates the same regions of the brain as physical pain, is exactly what you needed to get used to and that took you out of the way with spiritual standards. When you lose someone you thought was strong, then you find out you're the one who put up with everything, you develop a rooting; 20 There's a profound difference between someone who's silent because there's nothing to say and someone who's silent because they're watching. Many people enter an environment trying to be seen, heard and approved. They talk, explain, laugh too much and try to convince everyone around. But some people enter an environment with a completely different goal. They come in to understand. When you get to a place, your focus is rarely to draw attention. Your focus is to understand the environment. Who talks too much, who changes behavior depending on who's around, who interrupts constantly, who tries to look safer than really. While the others are busy trying to impress, you're gathering information. There's something curious about this process. When people think you're too quiet or apparently distracted, they relax, they lower their defenses. They start talking more than they should. They reveal details they would normally hide. In a way, their silent presence becomes a mirror that allows their true behavior to appear naturally. For those who depend on social manipulation, this is extremely uncomfortable.

Manipulators like predictable people. They like to know exactly what reaction they will provoke in each situation. But when they find someone who watches before they react, their entire script begins to fail. And when the script fails, the first reaction is to try to discredit and discredit that person. Then the comments come up. They say you're cold, they say you're distant, they say you can't handle people. But the truth is different. You weren't isolated, you were alert. And real attention... It's what few can keep for a long time. There is a kind of invisible power that many people use in human relationships. It's not physical strength, it's not formal authority, it's the power of emotional reaction. Some people provoke, criticize or pressure, because they know that this generates an immediate response. When they can get someone to lose control, they feel that they have won the situation. Now think how many times they've tried to provoke you, hoping for an emotional explosion.

Passive-aggressive comments, small provocations, insinuations. Many people do this by waiting for the other to scream, defend himself or conflict. When that happens, they can control the narrative of the situation. But when someone has emotional control, something unexpected happens. The handler loses the main tool he used to master the conversation. Without explosive reaction, without drama and despair, the environment changes completely. Suddenly, those who tried to provoke begin to seem out of control in the face of the calm of those who did not react. This kind of emotional control is not born from indifference, it is born from consciousness. You feel emotions like anyone else. The difference is you don't allow them to lead your decisions. Before you answer, you observe, analyze, ask and test. Before you act, you evaluate. And that pause completely changes the outcome of situations. And here there is a truth that few admit. People who live manipulating emotions are deeply uncomfortable in front of someone who doesn't react as expected, either knock-off or emotional. Because right now they realize something they can't control. They are before someone who cannot be driven by emotional chaos. 21 The focal point is letter, the word, not your interpretation. 22 I'll show you how this game works from the inside, because when you understand the rules, you stop being a manipulative player. There's a pattern that scholars call a scapegoat. And in dysfunctional family systems, the enemy of souls almost always designates someone to carry the guilt and shadow of the whole family. This person is chosen to be this "bod", often without anyone noticing, precisely because she is the most sensitive, the most conscious, the most able to see what others refuse to see. Think with me. In a family where everyone speaks ill of one another, what happens to one who decides not to participate? He's the stranger. In a family where no one assumes their responsibilities, what happens to the one who solves, seeks to solve the real problems, to do what is entrusted to them, to the kingdom in the first place and to take care of himself? He becomes the troublesome, what you think, the indifferent. His sensitivity was called weakness. His silence was interpreted as arrogance. Your kindness was used as proof that you were naive. Every word against you was like a spell, trying to build a fake identity, a version of you that never existed, but that was necessary for the sick system to continue working without needing to change. They didn't fight you, man. They were fighting what you represented, the mirror. You were, and you are, an unwanted reflection. Your cure exposed their unhealed wounds. His light revealed the shadows they avoided. Their growth was a silent accusation of their stagnation. And the only one

The solution was trying to break the mirror. Now I need to show you the three most used weapons in this ritual of humiliation, you lived them all, not knowing exactly what it was. The first weapon is gaslighting. It's one of the most devastating forms of psychological manipulation there is. Gaslighting happens when someone systematically distorts the reality around you to make you doubt your own sanity. "That never happened." "You're overreacting." "You're very dramatic." "Nobody did that." "You understand everything wrong." When it comes from a stranger, it's easier to identify. But when it comes from inside the house, from your mother, from your father, from a brother, the confusion is overwhelming. You begin to question your own memory, your own perception, your own mental health. And that's exactly what the ritual needs to work. A target who doesn't trust himself. The second weapon is the libel campaign. While you thought they were just misunderstandings, there was behind the scenes a narrative being carefully built on who you are. A story that came before you in any new social cycle. Who whispered in the ear of people who didn't even know you. What a guarantee that even if you tried to build support out of there, that support would be undermined before it was established. Isolation is a control tool. When you're alone, no allies, no one who believes in you, it's much easier to convince you that the problem is you. The third weapon is the constant threat of rejection. This is the most subtle and powerful, because it doesn't even have to be said in words. She's in the look that closes when you disagree. In the climate that cools when you put a limit. In the silence that lasts days after you position yourself. The message is always the same. If you grow up, if you shine, if you dare to be who you really are, you will lose our affection and you will be alone. For a human being, the threat of rejection and loneliness is almost as terrifying as death. So you learned to shrink, to shut up, to ask

I'm sorry, not knowing why, to be less to be accepted, until that DIA. The trap was almost perfect, but the ritual failed. Remember how long you spent trying to fix what wasn't yours to fix? Think of the mental energy you invested trying to understand why those people acted like that. Trying to find the right words, the right time to explain yourself. Trying to prove that's not what they said you were. Trying to win back a love that was never actually offered in a healthy way. Some people spend decades in this cycle, go to therapy trying to adjust to be accepted. Change jobs, city, style, attitude, hair color. Everything to finally hear an "it's okay" that never comes and even if it came would never be authentic. Because it was never you. The problem was the system that needed you to be the problem. And to understand that, to feel that at the heart of your being, not only is that what changed everything, is the moment when you stopped asking for permission to exist, stopped waiting for the verdict of people who never qualified to judge you. That's when you recovered an immense amount of energy that was being drained in this endless search. That energy is yours, and now it goes back to where it should have always been. Now, I need to talk about something that goes beyond psychology, because what happened to you has a spiritual dimension that cannot be ignored. There is a principle that crosses sacred and human stories. Those who were called to something bigger almost always went through a season of rejection, humiliation and isolation first. Not as a punishment, but as a preparation. Think of Joseph, Jacob's beloved son, hated by his brothers. Why? Because he had dreams, because he saw beyond, because something in him pointed to a destiny that the brothers could not understand, and so they could not bear. What did you do? They threw him in a well, sold him as a slave, told his father he was dead. But history shows that each action of the brothers planned to destroy Joseph was actually a step in the larger plane to position him exactly where he needed to be. Slavery led him to Egypt, unjust imprisonment led him to the presence of Pharaoh. The humiliation was the corridor that led him to the crown. Think of David, anointed by the prophet Samuel, while he was still a young shepherd, while all his older brothers were considered candidates for the throne. The prophet looked at each and the guidance was, not this. Until they called the youngest, who cared for the sheep, what no one took seriously, and it was upon him that the anointing oil was poured out. But do you know what happens after David's anointing? He's not going straight to the palace, he's going to the cave, to the desert. He is persecuted by the king himself to whom he served loyally and never betrayed him even with numerous proposals. The solitude of the field was not abandonment, it was protection, it was a secret place where character is forged, where faith is tempered, where the king was prepared away from the eyes of the world before assuming the throne. And you recognize that pattern on your journey. The loneliness you felt was never abandonment, it was always protection. The isolation they imposed on you was not to destroy you, it was to separate you, to prepare you, to forge in you a resistance and a charity that are born only in pressure, in silent fire, in adversity. There is a phrase that transformed many lives by history, it appears in the book of Genesis, when Joseph finally reveals himself to the brothers who betrayed him, after years of all the pain, of a path that seemed hopeless. Joseph looks at those who planned his evil and declared: You guys mean me wrong, but the bigger plan turned it into good. This phrase is not naive, it is not denial of pain, it is the statement of those who understood the mechanics of a greater purpose, that the creative force is so sovereign that it can take what was planned for its destruction and use exactly that as the foundation for the construction of His Destiny. The well they dug for you became the weight movement for yours.

resurrection. Every tear you shed in secret knowing the heavens saw everything, those tears were collected. There's a psalm that says every tear is saved. This isn't just poetry, it's a statement that nothing you've been through has been in vain. Everything has been accounted for, everything has been preserved and everything is being turned into fuel for your tomorrow. Every lie told about you has been intercepted. Every word of evil cast against his name has found a limit and a mirror. There is a teaching that the curse without cause is not fulfilled*. While you walk in integrity, keeping your heart clean even before injustice, you activate a spiritual protection that neutralizes in invisible courts what was planned against you. The stone they tried to use to crush you became the cornerstone of our new path. But I need to be honest with you right now, because that path wouldn't be complete without the time of suffering. I know this is hard. I know there are days when sadness comes back strong, when you revive every scene, humiliation, injustice and anger comes together as if it were the first time. That's human. That doesn't mean you didn't forgive. It means you've been deeply injured and the cure doesn't happen in a straight line. The cure happens in a spiral. You go back to almost the same point, only higher and higher. 23 Opening The Ark, rrsr whoever's carrying extra weight will be sick. 24 There is nothing hidden or done in secret that will not be revealed. Nothing. No history of your life will be without a definite ending, and I assure you, you will see the outcome of each of them.

25 There are many subtle influences on the format and flow of information that unfold around a person, not always in an obvious way, but on patterns that continue over time. To understand the weight and what really matters in this observation is to look at how human behavior is shaped under pressure. In many cases, people are influenced by what they live repeatedly and, over time, begin to reflect these experiences in their own behavior, often without realizing it. If someone experiences treason, they can start waiting or even repeat it. If someone experiences abandonment, they can start to walk away or close themselves to others. If someone experiences pain or cruelty, they can begin to carry that same energy in the way they react to the world. This usually does not happen by conscious decision, but by accumulation, where repeated experiences slowly shape responses and patterns. And when that happens, it changes both the way a person works internally, and the way he relates to the world around him, because his reactions cease to be totally separate from what he lived. In this sense, there is constant pressure on individuals to be defined by what happened to them, to internalize this as an identity rather than just an experience. And when this change occurs, it directly and indirectly affects the way they think, act and respond, often limiting their ability to act from a place that is not conditioned by the pain of the past. That day, at that moment when you had all the reasons and even emotional permission to become what your pain was trying to transform you, you didn't become. And this decision was not just a personal act of force or a simple demonstration of self-control. It represented something much deeper, something that interrupted a pattern that was forming around your life. Everything that was lining up to produce a certain result through your experiences, you lost your direction the moment you didn't respond in the way that result required. It is as if the structure that had been built around this expected outcome had lost its base, not by resistance or confrontation, but because the predicted reaction simply did not happen. And when that reaction doesn't appear, the whole system that depended on it starts to lose coherence. And what you have perceived as changes or displacements is a consequence of this interruption. Things that once seemed aligned against you no longer move in the same way, not by a visible fight on your part, but because the expected pattern was broken exactly on you. In that sense, what happened in your life is nothing random. The irony is that it seems common on the surface, but underneath it reveals something deeply consistent with who you are in your core. Even under exhaustion, even under repeated emotional weight... Even under pressure that should have changed your direction, something essential inside you remained intact and continued to express yourself, that resonant gold wire, remember? He's visible from far away. You did not choose consciously, it is a high response through effort and discipline at that time, but not born there. Rather than expected, something in its deepest nature simply continued to function as it was formed to function. And that's what gives meaning to the result you've experienced, because it shows that what you are essentially isn't completely overlaid by what you've lived. And this is where the deepest connection arises, because similar patterns appear in the accounts found in the Gospels, where common human encounters reveal something much greater about response, perception and transformation. In Luke 7, there is a moment involving a Pharisee named Simon, who invited Jesus for a meal. And during that scenario, a woman entered, known for the weight of her past, carrying with her something that symbolized both her history and her intention. She brought an alabaster vase with perfume and positioned herself in a way that reflected a deeply personal response rather than a social expectation. Behind Jesus and weeping, her tears fell on her feet, and she wiped them with her own hair, kissing his feet and anointing them with charismatic perfume in a way that showed total devotion rather than any social expectation. When Simon the Pharisee observed this scene, he silently judged the situation. Thinking that if Jesus really knew who that woman was and what her past was, he would completely reject her presence. But Jesus, perceiving his thoughts, responded not with a direct confrontation, but with a parable about two people who owed a debt, one much greater than the other, and none of them could pay until the creditor forgave both. Then he asked a simple question about which one would feel more love in response to that forgiveness. And Simon answered correctly that he to whom he was most forgiven would love more. Jesus then confirmed his answer and redirected attention to the woman, asking Simon to truly observe what was before him. He pointed out that Simon offered none of the basic signs of honor or hospitality. No water for the feet, no kiss of greeting, no oil for his head, while the woman expressed all this through her actions, using her tears, her hair and her perfume as acts of reverence. Then he declared that his many sins were forgiven because his love was great. What is revealed at this moment is not the denial of her past, but a complete reinterpretation of it, where everything she lived and everything that defined her socially This is not treated as disqualification, but as a context that gives even more depth to your response. Your story is not used as evidence against you, on the contrary, it is the background that highlights the depth of your love. In the same way, everything you faced

It is not presented as limitation or deficiency in your history, but as the very measure of what you have managed to preserve, despite everything that has tried to diminish it. The extent of what you have lived becomes what makes your continuity, openness and response so significant, even when circumstances would normally lead to the opposite. Just as that woman loved without calculations, without certainty of being received and without any guarantee that what she was offering would be valued or understood, you also continued to express something real from the genuine depth of who you are. Even when everything around you gave you permission to stop, you still chose to remain open in a way that was not forced, was not staged and did not depend on the results to be done. And in this sense, what Jesus said about it reflects the same principle that the silence of heaven represents in relation to his experience at that time. His many sins were forgiven, because he loved very much. The idea here is that, in a deep spiritual understanding, restoration or accelerated fulfillment is not measured by how much someone suffered, but by the quality of love and authenticity that still flows through a soul that has gone through much and yet has not closed. Now. With regard to his experience, his many sins were forgiven, because he loved much, much more than was expected, beyond what everyone else does. The idea here is that, in a deeper spiritual understanding, restoration or accelerated fulfillment is not measured by how much someone suffered, but by the quality of love and authenticity that still flows through a soul that has gone through much and yet not closed. Now, by connecting this with the language of Revelation 12, a kind of victory that operates through three elements is described: Be covered, give testimony and refuse to retreat before fear or pressure. Coverage is fundamental and necessary, but testimony is what expresses the experience lived without being erased or reduced. It is not about presenting perfection, even because I know of their not pride in them; but to reflect honestly what was faced and what remained unchanged in their mentality throughout it. In this sense, your testimony is not only what happened to you, but the continuity of who you remained while this was happening. And this continuity, always becomes, in itself already evidences all this overcoming. Since it remained unchanged within you throughout this period. Your testimony is not just what happened to you, but the continuity of who you remained while this was happening. And this continuity itself becomes evidence of overcoming, not as a title of superiority, but as a precise reflection of resistance to preserved identity. The final part of the text talks about the refusal to shrink before life itself, which does not mean recklessness, but rather not allowing fear, pressure or pain to reduce the core of who a person was created to be. 26 You carry something that dysfunctional dynamics have never been able to erase, its true essence. And it's exactly that essence that's being recognized now. But before you talk about what's going on with your family, I need to help you understand how you got here, because the story that was told about you, the version of you that circled the conversations that you didn't participate in, the trials that were made behind your back, that story didn't come out of nowhere, it was built, brick by brick, carefully, with intent. Think of me, do you remember moments when you tried to explain yourself and were interrupted, from situations where your version of the facts never came to the full ear of who mattered, from times when you felt that there was an invisible force working against your reputation within your own family? That wasn't your paranoia, that was a pattern. In dysfunctional family dynamics, there is almost always a figure what psychology scholars call the central narrator, the person who controls the narrative. She doesn't have to scream, she doesn't have to be obviously cruel. She often presents herself as the most concerned, the most present, the one who loves the family the most. But underneath this care mask, there is a very precise mechanism of control. This mechanism works like this: information is filtered, conversations are reported incompletely or distorted, silences are filled with convenient assumptions and gradually, without anyone knowing consciously, the image of certain people is being changed, especially the image of those who dare to question, who refuse to participate in the game, who insist on maintaining their own perspective. That person was you. You questioned, you refused, you kept your perspective and so you became the family problem. Not because you were the problem, but because you were the threat to the narrative that someone needed to maintain. Now, here's the part that I need you to understand very clearly, because it's fundamental to what's happening in these March days. When a person carries a truth within himself, even if buried, even if denied, even if completely suppressed, that truth does not disappear, it stays, it grows, it presses. Human consciousness has an extraordinary capacity for endurance, but it also has a limit. And when that limit is reached, what happens is not an explosion, it's a silent implosion. And that moment when someone you know is lying, staring at the ceiling and suddenly, a memory pops up. Then another one, then another one. And these memories begin to connect in a way that never happened before. It's like the fragments of a puzzle that's been scattered for years all of a sudden start to fit in on their own. And the image that comes out of this puzzle is not what this person expected to see. This member of your family, the one who for so long repeated the charges, that I saw you as a problem, that maybe he'd gotten away from you because of stories that weren't true, he's going through it right now. He's reviewing the Sunday lunches where you didn't show up and remember the explanation that was given. Only now, with the distance from time and the weight he's feeling, that explanation doesn't sound like truth anymore. It sounds like a story that was told with great convenience. He's remembering the times you tried to explain yourself, the words you said, the expression on your face. Expression that he ignored at the time because he was seeing you with someone else's eyes, literally. He was looking at you through the eyes of the narrative that was built on you. But now those eyes are starting to be his real eyes. And what they're seeing is different. He's realizing the pattern, that conversations about you always happened when you weren't there to defend yourself. That the comments that seemed to worry, I'm worried about the path Rafael is taking. I think Carla needs help. I don't know what happened to Pedro. In fact, they followed a very precise logic of disqualification. He's realizing who the architect of the division was. And that perception is rewriting everything. I want to ask you a question. And I want you to answer honestly inside yourself. All these years of misunderstanding, of distance, of being seen in a way that wasn't you, what did you feel? Anger, for sure. Pain, no doubt. But deep down, in your quietest place, what was there? The answer was, love. You still loved these people. Even when they repeated the charges, you prayed in silence that one day the truth would come out. Even when the doors closed, you kept in your heart the hope that one day someone would see what really happened. This constancy is rare. This ability to maintain love where others would only hold resentment. That's not weakness. That's a

of the clearest marks of who is a chosen one. And you know what the cruel irony of all this is? Exactly that light you were carrying, that clarity, that conviction, that refusal to participate in the dysfunctional dynamics, was the most disturbing. You were a mirror, and mirrors are impossible to bear for those who are hiding things from themselves. When someone is in a comfortable illusion, the last thing he wants is someone who, just by his presence, remembers that there is another way to live. You did it by accident, and that's why you needed to be diminished, explained, problematized. But let's get back to that member of your family. This process that he is living has a name in psychology: intense cognitive dissonance. It is when two completely opposite realities co-exist within someone's mind, so it is no longer possible to ignore one of them. On the one hand, there is the narrative he carried for years, the version of you that was built and fed, the judgments that he incorporated with yours, without realizing they were imported. On the other hand, there is the real memory, the memory of his eyes, his words, his attempts, his silence, which he now understands differently. These two realities can no longer coexist. One of them needs to give in. And in those days, the scale is leaning toward the truth. That's not easy for him. On the contrary, it is probably one of the most painful processes a human being can go through. Because it's not just about changing an opinion about you. It's about rebuilding your own identity. When that person fully realizes what happened, he'll need to look himself in the mirror and recognize it. I was part of it. Even without knowing. Even though I believed I was doing the right thing. I repeated the charges. I walked away. I chose the convenient narrative rather than the truth. And that's humiliating in a way that goes deep into the soul. And here comes something that I need you to understand, because it's going to be fundamental to how you're going to position yourself. The initial reaction of many people when the consciousness begins to emerge, not immediate openness. It's not the apology call you imagine. Sometimes it's the opposite. Sometimes it's an even greater resistance. An attempt to suffocate what is emerging, because the pain of recognizing is unbearable. An irritability without apparent cause. An even deeper departure for a short period. That doesn't mean the awakening isn't happening. It means it's happening with all the force. Think of an iceberg that's been frozen for decades when the environment starts to warm up. Before he melts, he creaks, he creases, stala, he makes noise. The defrosting process is not silent. 27  The favor only comes, only comes, after exact obedience. Never before. 28 Let's talk about something that most people never stop to really understand, the invisible functioning of divine justice. Not the justice you learn at school, the one with the judge and the visible court. I'm talking about a much more precise system, much more comprehensive and far more powerful than any human court could be. There is a spiritual law that crosses all traditions, all cultures, all peoples of the Earth. You can call it Karma, you can call it the law of sowing and harvesting, you can call it divine retribution. Names change, but the principle is exactly the same. No action goes unanswered, no injustice goes blank. God has a perfect memory and he does not operate in his time, he operates in the right time and perfect time. Now think to me, when a farmer plants a seed, he won't go the next day to rip out the land to see if it germinated. He knows the process has its own rhythm. The seed needs water, sun, time inside the darkness before breaking the ground and becoming something visible. If the farmer were to take the

Seed every time he got impatient, he would never reap anything. The same logic applies to spiritual justice. The fact that you're not seeing the consequences acting on whoever hurt you doesn't mean anything's going on. It means that the process is still underground and when it breaks through the ground, it will be impossible to ignore. But here's something I need you to understand with all the depth you can absorb right now. While justice was preparing outside, something was being built inside you. And that's the real gift hidden in your pain. Think of what you learned about yourself through betrayal. You found out you had more strength than you thought. You found out where your boundaries were, who really was on your side, and who was close to you for convenience. You learned to observe more, to trust more selectively, to value your own perception. No school in the world teaches these lessons with the same efficiency as pain teaches. And now I want to ask you something. Don't answer out loud, but answer yourself with complete honesty. In the toughest moments after betrayal, when anger hit harder, when the will to get even or prove you right was almost unbearable, what did you do? You chose not to go down to the level of who hurt you. You kept your integrity even when it hurt. You continued to be yourself when the situation asked for a smaller, bitterer, more vengeful version of you. That wasn't weakness, that was the most powerful decision you could have made, the whole sky saw it, we were already watching you. There is a huge difference between the person who goes through a betrayal and comes out of it full of poison and the person who goes through the same experience and comes out of it more refined. The poison contaminates everything around. He pushes away opportunities, closes doors, repels the right people. Refining, on the other hand, attracts. It creates a quality of presence that people feel before they even understand why. Yours

The choice to maintain integrity was not passivity, it was an investment. And it opened up a milestone to the moment that this investment starts generating feedback in a way that you will be able to see, feel and touch. Now I want to talk about the signs, because you're going through this restoration window, there are things you're probably already noticing, even if you haven't put words to them yet. Pay attention to this list and see how many of these signs you recognize in your life right now. The first sign is that doors that seemed completely sealed began to open without resistance. Not with much effort, not after long battles, but almost organically. An opportunity you weren't even expecting appears. A conversation happens at the right time, a connection forms in a way that seems almost impossible to have been accidental. The second sign is that conversations that once excluded your name now include you naturally. People who didn't recognize you, environments that seemed closed to you, situations where your presence just wasn't considered, start changing posture. Not because you asked, not because you imposed yourself, but because your energy changed in a real way, and still is, your absence begins to be perceived as a loss. The third sign is internal and may be the most significant of all. The tension that the past has imposed on your mind is diminishing. You think more clearly, you react less emotionally. Situations that used to take you off the axis now go through you without controlling you. That's not indifference, that's real healing. It's your nervous system recognizing that the danger has passed and that it's safe to relax the defenses now, I know you're still struggling with it, it's human you're evolving. The fourth sign is that your judgment has become sharper. You've come to realize people's intentions with a precision that you didn't have before. You feel before you see it, you know before it's confirmed. And that's the direct result of having lived the betrayal and processed the pain consciously. Yours ability to read situations and people got on a completely different level. The fifth sign, and this is the quietest of all, is a peace that has no logical explanation. Amid situations that are not yet completely resolved, amid uncertainties that still exist, there is within you a stillness that was not there before. It is not resignation, it is not withdrawal, it is a profound certainty that comes from a place above rational thought, that things are heading where they should go. That kind of peace is not made, it is granted. And when you feel it, it's because your spirit has already received a confirmation that your mind is still processing. 29

Resilience is not technical; it is identity.

1 They saw the blows hit the target, but they can't process it because you don't remain shattered on the ground. What you are beginning to discover with a silent terror is that resilience is not just something you do or a technique that applies; it is your own identity, fundamental. And there is no earthly logic, psychology manual or manipulation strategy that can explain or neutralize this phenomenon. The influence operates in such a fluid and effortless way that it terrifies those who live in appearance. In the common world, it is believed that the influence should be accompanied by exhaustive work, rehearsed discourses, logical arguments, charisma manufactured or at least deliberate manipulation. But with you, the process is organic, magnetic. The way you conduct yourself, the integrity of the decisions you make, and especially the things you refuse to do in principle, generate a domino effect that reaches far more distant places than your imagination can conceive. Have you noticed how your silent behavior dictates the tone of the environment? Someone watches you choose honesty instead of the easy shortcut, and suddenly that person starts questioning his own ethical commitments. Another person notices the firmness with which you pull yourself out of toxic situations and it plants in it the seed that perhaps he should also do the same. You don't have to convince anyone with words. His posture is what condemns error and brings conviction of truth. And that deeply disturbs those who prefer warm comfort from lame excuses. The serpents who tried to extinguish their light with such effort failed to understand a basic principle. Each attack suffered just cut and reveals its true creative power. There is a spiritual shield designed millimetrically to neutralize these attacks, causing the envy cast against you 'inflamed darts' to return multiplied to its original source. This shield is real, and it's called Faith. You can't fake it. Understand that this kind of influence has nothing to do with power in the traditional sense. It's not about having a giant platform, pompous videos or demanding people follow you. It's something much more visceral. It's about how your mere presence interrupts what people considered normal. Whole conversation changes course just because you sat at the table. Expensive plans are altered because your energy accesses even after the wrong choice suddenly seems too heavy to sustain. People around you begin to adjust, not because you asked or demanded, but because your own being exposes the weight and consequences of their decisions. That's what destabilizes them. You don't change by control, but the control seems to bend and shape around you. What your rival doesn't want is to admit that your influence reveals their weakness. If they really believed in the distorted values they preach, their presence would not shake them so much. But the fact that you bother so much proves that somewhere deep in their being, they already know that their foundations are fragile and made of sand. That's why some admire you with fervor, while others resent you with hatred. Deep down, it's the same effect, just filtered by the truth or the denial of each one. For an awake person, his influence sounds like liberation. To those who live in darkness, it sounds like a threat. Anyway, no one leaves a meeting with you without being transformed. The most intriguing point is that you're not even trying to influence anyone. You're just being authentically yourself. And that is exactly what makes their power invincible, for there is no strategy against which they can resist. They can argue with a preacher, ignore a politician or stop following a leader of opinion. But they can't erase the silent impact of someone who lives their truth in an integral and ineligious way. Your influence remains echoing in their minds long after you left the room. The more they try to resist this impact, the more they expose how much they have already been affected by it. That's the real power you carry. Not to force change in others, but to make it inevitable by contrast. You carry an untouchable authority that cannot be explained by positions, wealth or social position. In a world obsessed with external status, hierarchies, and validations, people are accustomed to an authority that is granted by promotions, diplomas, or votes. But with you, the rule is different. His authority is not delivered by any human system, nor validated by social approval. It radiates naturally from its center and no amount of social ranking or defamation can nullify what is divine right. Moreover, it is for this reason that even those who technically hold a higher position than theirs or hold more titles still feel the inevitable impact of their presence. 2 This is a week of reversals and disruptions. This Friday is not just about something good happening, it's about heavy reversals, it's about things that have been blocked, delayed or denied being suddenly released in your favor. God doesn't just break your past. He gives you divine reversals that shock the world and silence every opponent in his life. Imagine a situation where you thought you had no way out, no solution, no future, but God intervenes and in an instant everything changes. The tide turns, the doors open, the skies release what you were waiting for. The kind of miracle that not only answers your prayer but makes you a witness. Think of the story of Joseph, the man who was betrayed by his brothers, sold as a slave and played in prison. He was forgotten, but God had a plan, an unimaginable plan. From the depths of the prison, Joseph was raised to become the second most powerful man in Egypt. This was a divine reversal and the same God who changed Joseph's life is the same God who is changing his situation on Friday in an overflowing way. There is a profound principle in the Word that speaks about the importance of expectation. Your expectation positions you to receive the unimaginable. If you don't expect anything, you get nothing. But if you expect everything, the unimaginable becomes your reality. Expectation is not a passive hope, it is active faith that opens the heavens. God does not answer doubt, He answers to faith that extends beyond logic to the realm of divine possibility. In Mark 11:24 it says: Therefore I say to you that whatever you ask, believe that you will receive it, and you will have it. God is telling you: Wait for the unimaginable. Don't pray like a beggar. Pray like a son of the King. Don't wait for crumbs when the full table has been prepared for you. Stay courageously in prayer and let your faith correspond to the magnitude of the promise. God is not intimidated by great prayers. He feels insulted by a small faith. So wait for healing, wait for restoration, wait for deliverance, expect divine surprise still beyond what you have seen. Prepare your heart for the impossible. Your prayers have been heard and now the sky is lining up to deliver what you asked for. You don't know how, but God knows when. And He said: This Friday, it will be done. Let your spirit remain in position, aligned vibrating the worship emanating from your heart. Let your words reflect your faith. Let your heart remain clean and expectant. Because when expectation meets God's time, miracles are born. Let me talk to you directly. Some of you have been waiting for years and others, believe me, for decades. You have passed through the fire, through the desert, through the trials and yet here you are on the threshold of a historic moment. The enemy tried to wear

You, breaking your faith, convincing him that this would never happen. But by the grace of God, you survived. And not only did you survive, you were being secretly strengthened for this very hour. This is the moment you've been waiting for. Heaven heard his prayers, saw and soon collected his tears and knew the desires of his heart. And now, this Friday, you will receive divine intervention in a way that only God could orchestrate. This is not a random calendar date. This is a prophetic compromise. What can't happen in the last 16 years will unfold in an Act. Doors you couldn't push are just opening themselves. Line up your spirit, you're ready. In Psalm 35 it says that his anger lasts only a moment. Life is in your favor. Crying may last a night, but joy comes in the morning. Crying night's over. The heavens have changed. Your name is being mentioned in rooms you haven't entered. Your file is on the decision makers' desk. Your case has reached the court of heaven and the verdict has been declared. The favor does come. Your mourning season is almost over. The joy is coming and is coming this Friday. Remain in faith, remain in position and remain expectant, because when the heavens move, nothing can stop it. You may not see with your natural eyes, but the spiritual atmosphere is changing. God is moving in the invisible. Angels are preparing to perform the very tasks for which you have prayed. You're on the verge of something monumental, something so big, so powerful, that you'll blow new life into every warm area of your life. The war you endured was not in vain. The resistance you felt was a sign that the blessing is near. The atmosphere has changed and what was once delayed is about to be delivered. Remember the story of Elijah when he prayed for rain. The sky had been dry for years and there was no sign of rain. But Elijah knew in his spirit that God had heard his prayer and sent his servant to look. The seventh time, the servant saw one cloud as small as a man's hand. First Kings 18:44 That little cloud was the beginning of a powerful storm. Do not despise the small signs, because what begins small will soon overcome your life with favor, restoration and overflowing. The heavens are already answering your prayers. This Friday, the floodgates will open. What seemed silent will explode in divine answers. What was dry will now be saturated. What seemed dead will suddenly bloom. The atmosphere is no longer against you, she's working for you. In these periods you began to have an idea of what the soul aligned with the spirit can manifest in your physical. All the rational pressure in a way that your mind often misinterpreted and now uses energy in a fluid way. The behavior of the nervous system under prolonged stress points to fascinating patterns. The body, when subjected to intense and sustained tension, does not simply endure, it reorganizes itself. Neuroscience already indicates a clear tendency that biological systems under adequate pressure develop new neural pathways, new processing capabilities as well as generating new blood vessels and at the right frequency, stem cells; new ways to perceive and respond to the world that simply would not exist without the stress that generated them. That's not poetry, that's the literal description of what happens in your nervous system when you go through a difficult season, and instead of being destroyed by it, it emerges with a perception that people around you simply cannot access because they never needed to be forged that way. You haven't left your trials the same. You've come out differently in a way you haven't learned to fully value. And when that energy touches matter, when this spiritual reorganization finds the physical body, what happens has a name that medicine observes with increasing interest. The vagus nerve, that neurological pathway that connects the brain to the heart, to the lungs, to the intestine, to the entire immune system, is deeply sensitive to the inner state of being. You already know but imagine how many people have no idea that cardiac coherence, the state in which the heart hits a harmonic pattern rather than chaotic, is directly linked to the sense of purpose, connection, belonging to 'something greater'. When you are disconnected from your call, when you live in a chronic state of dissonance between what you feel was done to be and what life seems to offer you, your body records it as a form of threat. Cortisol rises, the immune system falls dramatically, sleep breaks, not because you are weak, but because your body is being HONEY about the cost of living out of the frequency for which it was originally tuned. This fatigue is often not lazy, it is the nervous system protesting against a life that has not yet found its real axis. Now I want you to pay special attention to why this information has changed the meaning of how you've been analyzing this whole frame of pending. Looking back; on both sides of your lineage, the weight you carry has roots that go far beyond you. In the field of epigenetics it is scientifically proven with more than 221 case studies; and it is also something that spiritual traditions have always intuitively learned: the patterns of fear, forced silence, repressed greatness, do not begin or end in a single generation. There is an increasing clinical pattern that stress markers can be biologically transmitted across generations, that your ancestors' emotional wounds can leave impressions on your nervous system that you have never consciously chosen to carry. That changes the conversation. Now, this conversation specifically aimed at you, that's right, you, you're not just facing your own limits, you're, in many senses, being called to be the breaking point of patterns that ran in their lineage for decades or centuries. The call about your life isn't just about you, it's about what you carry back to your family tree by conquering what previous generations never could. Joseph's story is not just a narrative of great importance. This was the first release and break of evil behavioral patterns: the envy coming from those who should protect you or at least be loyal to their own values. The book is the most honest manual about what it means to bear an extraordinary purpose in a world that is not yet ready to receive it. Before Joseph's brothers looked at him jealously before the grave, before the prison, before any of the betrayals that marked his trajectory, there was a dream. And that dream was not given to him as a reward for something he had conquered, it was placed on him as seed before he had any history to justify it. The pit could not take away what God had already decided. Prison could not erase the dream that had been planted in it before its brothers felt the first flash of jealousy. Joseph's purpose was not something he encountered during those years of unjust suffering. It was something that was being formed, refined in the corner of betrayal, sharp in the silence of a forgotten cell, prepared for the moment when the most powerful empire on earth desperately needed exactly what the only man appointed had been silently becoming. The palace demanded the well, the throne demanded the prison. And here's the point that changes everything when you can really absorb it. The purpose is not a lost object that you track through effort and merit. It is a seed of the Creator, already embedded in the ground of his soul, waiting not for his frenzied search, but for his willingness to receive it. The difference is not semantic, that's all. Seek implies that the purpose has gone away and put all the weight of recovery on your shoulders.

Revelation implies that he was always there, under the layers of expectation and fear, hoping that the conditions of his spirit would align with his proper energy. You stop running, you start positioning yourself. This transition from anxious corridor to prepared receiver is one of the deepest transformations a human being can make and it rarely happens dramatically. It happens in silence, it happens on a common morning when you decide, for the first time, no rush, just be there where you are. The three Hebrew men, Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, were not exempt from the furnace. They walked directly into a heated oven seven times hotter than usual. Not with equipment and thickened tooth protectors, but with a surrendered confidence that challenged every instinct of self-preservation. And inside that fire, they weren't alone. A fourth figure walked with them.) And it was in surrender, not in resistance, that the miracle became visible. This is the spiritual paradox at the center of humanity. 4 The mark in the hand, means everything that handles in your everyday life, your energies of action, is not what you pretend to be. Already the mark on the forehead, are your thoughts and your mentality! And today that mark is very visible in the life of the whole world, in what region of the world! What you think and what you do, transmits at a huge distance who you are. Both marks. 5 This happens when one only sees in the other the version of oneself that does not win. Pic Dickvigarista never realizes when the wall arrives. 6 The empty word scares a lot of people, because for them, empty means absence, loss, nothing, death. It's like not having the foundation to lean on. But there is another kind of void, in which it is not destructive. Exists a void that sustains, a space that is not a need, but a foundation, a stillness that is not a threat, but a rest. When you go into a deep, dreamless sleep, you feel like you've disappeared, like you've fallen into the absolute nothing. However, his body is still alive, his heart still beats, his breath continues, his whole body reorganizes, heals and balances. Everything is working normally inside you, even when you are not present as never. That's enough to make you think. Because if everything really became nothing, then nothing could sustain life. What exists there may not be consciousness as you know it, but it is also not simply non-existence. It is an informed state, without history, without narrator, without content, but effective, real and present. And you more than anyone else have a unique connection to the void. They feel that silence can be their home, that quiet can offer answers, that the absence of noise can move them. You don't have to fill everything with stimuli. What you often seek most is pure inner space. This void can be a place where the soul rests character. A place where you don't have to convince anyone, prove value, keep an image or control anything. It's a pause in the struggle to exist as an identity. So there is a hidden relief in this mystery. Even if you don't remember, your entire system benefits. It's like for a few hours you've been returning to a simple state, just being, no explaining, no chores, no anxiety. Life in a waking state has many overlapping layers, names, roles, responsibilities, expectations, fear, desires, comparisons. All this carries a certain weight. And you feel this burden, even showing that you don't, you support it with intensity, because you feel more, absorb more, think more deeply. Deep sleep may be the only real pause of these layers. That's why there are nights when you sleep and wake up with that feeling of 'I'm back'. Not because you remembered something,

But because you were cleansed from within, as if an invisible layer of dust had been removed from your inner being. And that being true, then the void is not the enemy. It is a reminder that there is that plasma flame inside you that is independent of external noise, it is always continuous, even when identity ceases. You, perhaps more than any other, are called to recognize this place, to respect that silence and not fear it. Perhaps the most true question is not where you go when you do not dream, but 'What remains when everything you call you disappears?'. Because that answer changes everything. The night is not just a time space period. It could be the mirror, the one that shows that your identity is not as solid as you think. Every night you touch that mystery, and you touch it easily, without technique, without belief, without early preparation. You just go back and forth. And the weirdest thing about it is you come back believing nothing happened. But if nothing happened, why do you rest with that result? Because the body reorganizes. Because the mind restarts. And that's, that makes you wake up with a constant sense of existence. There's something in there that keeps operating, even if you don't access it. I know this mystery is directly linked to life in the waking state. Because if there's a place where you don't need to be someone, then maybe there's also a way to freedom during the day. With this, these are the moments when you can rest without sleeping, simply calming your inside. Sometimes, in the practice of full attention, you experience small nights for a few seconds. The mind goes blank, you stop defining yourself, stop telling your story, stop explaining yourself. This happens when you look at the sky, when you hear a specific sound, when you breathe deeply, when you're silent. These are moments when you and character get loose. These moments frighten some, but for you, they are attracted to them, because there is peace, simplicity, return to the essence even if, for some moment, it is noticeable for

You. It is not paralysis, but presence, a presence, which, although silent, is the most authentic. So watch, feel, don't try to solve it as a math problem. This mystery is no ordinary puzzle. It doesn't require an intellectual response. It requires inner posture, humility and attention. You may not remember where dreams don't exist, but that doesn't mean they don't exist. They are born straight from memory, in the prepared state in which you hold nothing, because there is no one there to cling to. And if every night you connect with this, then perhaps the deepest truth about you is not what you need to achieve, but what you always return to, in silence, effortlessly. That is why the moment you began to seek quietness; more truth, more depth are always conceived. You're responding to an ancestral call, an invitation to recognize that there's something inside you that doesn't need a story to be real. You may not remember the place, but you may never have stopped being him. And as we reach the end, a simple truth, but difficult to accept, remains. Every night you cross a place where your identity loses power. The name disappears, history disappears, anxieties disappear, and then life continues within you. For most people, this goes unnoticed to death, but for the little ones, this little detail ignites an inner flame, because it touches the oldest issue of all. What am I without me? On this journey, we saw that deep sleep may seem a complete shutdown, but it can also be a significant silence. 7 The opening of the seventh seal. It is such a profound moment that it transforms you forever, there is no way back after the sea closes behind you. You are being called upon to witness this manifesto of what you sought and to assume the active role in transformation from you. The seventh seal is not only the personal journey, it is also a collective journey. When you assume your power, your protocols, embracing your role, you help guide others toward the light. A guide, a beacon of truth and ancient wisdom, helping others to understand and embrace their own purpose. The seventh seal also represents the closing of one chapter and the opening of another. It's a time of transition when old systems, old ways of thinking and patterns of behavior will begin to crumble. As they rise, they will help rebuild the world on a foundation of truth, love, and spiritual wisdom of truth through the Son. The seventh seal marks the beginning of the new era, I know it comes to be hilarious, but it is an era in which the Creator God will no longer be hidden, but fully present in all aspects of life and available to those who have true humility to reach the next steps in the definitive way, do not fight against; but show the real ways. This is a time of power and great responsibility. The opening of these seals is not something to fear, but something to be embraced, for it will be the expected leap for millennia. It is the key to your spiritual freedom, the door to the real state of consciousness, your true I Am. When you enter the truth of breaking the seal of the will, you will begin to understand your place in the universe, your role in God's plan and your real power under his protocols. This is a prophecy about the silence that is being revealed. The world is changing and you are part of this change. The seventh seal is not just a symbol, it's a reality, and it's happening right now. You are called to rise, awaken and enter your divine purpose. The spiritual and cosmic meaning of the seventh seal is not just a symbol, enigma in ancient texts. To fully understand its importance, one must look beyond the physical plane and explore its essence in the spiritual and cosmic dimensions. When the seventh seal is opened, a profound awakening occurs not only in its being, but throughout the planet. It represents a change of consciousness, the dawn of a new era and the activation of divine truths that have been hidden for ages. In its essence, the seventh seal represents the final revelation of universal knowledge a knowledge that has been veiled for mankind for centuries, waiting for the right moment to be revealed. Its opening marks the end of one cycle and the beginning of another: a transition from ignorance to enlightenment. It is a spiritual rebirth, a time when the divine mysteries of existence will be revealed to those who are ready to receive them. When the seventh seal opens, it is not just an individual revelation, but a collective one. It indicates the beginning of a new era in which the veil between the physical and spiritual world becomes thinner, and divine forces become more accessible. Cosmic energies align, and those who are spiritually awake can access that elevated consciousness more easily. The seventh seal is the door to that lofty kingdom. A door that, when opened, allows divine truths to flow freely into the lives of those who are prepared to receive them. He also has the power to awaken sleeping spiritual gifts and abilities within you. It is the unlocking of hidden potential ? talents that come from other experiences, waiting for the right time to emerge. This is the time when these gifts begin to manifest, as divine energy flows through you, enabling you to fulfill your superior purpose. One of the deepest aspects of the seventh seal is its ability to open the mind and heart to universal wisdom. It is the moment when the chosen access a deeper understanding of God's plan and its role within him. This knowledge is not only intellectual is lived, sense and intuitive. As the seals were being opened, you began to realize the interconnection of all things and the balance that God sustains the cosmos. From the smallest grain of sand to the stars, everything is part From him who's the bigger all, and so are you. Spiritual Meaning the seventh seal is directly linked to the concept of ascension. Ascension is the process by which the soul evolves to a higher state in consciousness itself, discovering what was hidden by the veil of materialism transcending the limitations of the world and aligning itself with higher frequencies to love, wisdom and real light. The opening of the seventh seal is the beginning of this process. A gradual process of transformation, in which you break away from old beliefs, identities and patterns that no longer serve the purpose of your soul. It is a time of deep healing, where the healing specified for each wound is released and a new version of Self emerges. This seal also represents a cosmic event that impacts all mankind. As more people awaken, the vibration of mankind rises, bringing this new age where peace, love, and spiritual unity in God through the Son are truly recognized. This awakening generates a chain effect, inspiring others to also recognize their potential that was always released but that needed to be understood, structured to then have purpose. Thus, humanity draws ever closer to the essence of what the Creator created them to be, light. Finally, the seventh seal is also linked to God's so - called timeline. The universe operates within a calendar that goes beyond human understanding. The opening of the seventh seal marks a critical point in this flow. A moment when forces of the Throne converge to drive the evolution of humanity. For you, this is a time of great responsibility. They are not only observers, but active participants in the manifestation of the divine plan. 8 Comes galloping... 9 Acceleration protocol at 73%, 10 After you take on your real role, you never go unnoticed again, you never go back to being the ordinary person you were before. In the end, what you see was only material evidence, but the real revelation was you. The mirror not only reflected the failure of those who tried to diminish you, but the strategist you forged in the fire of necessity. And that's the part of the narrative that keeps vibrating in the air long after the dust goes down. But it doesn't stop there, because we need to face the fact that nowadays surveillance is the new form of accountability. That's a reality you can't run from. The moment your strategy attracted the spotlight, it wasn't just your targets that were forced to respond to what happened. You got on the radar too. To be observed by those who hold power does not just mean to be under constant suspicion. It means that every choice you make now is registered, catalogued and weighed on a strict scale. That same precision that used to give you total control, suddenly reverses the game and exposes you. What was once your greatest virtue, the ability to plan every detail without error, now becomes the criterion by which the world will judge you permanently. Are you ready to live under that magnifying lens, knowing that your intelligence is now seen as a weapon that needs to be monitored? In addition, that same precision that you so dearly end up becoming the exact reason why all looks remain stuck in you. Have you ever stopped to think that absolute accuracy arouses suspicion, because it exudes intent and intent, my dear, is the "prey" that they are always hunting? However, we need to understand that constant surveillance is not just a punishment tool. She is, first of all, a relentless record exercise. When authority agencies, or anyone in a position of power, begin to monitor their steps, they are not just observing, they are building a file. And you know what's colder about all this? This file does not show the smallest interest in your version of the facts. He solemnly ignores his noble motives or his internal dilemmas. What it tracks are concrete patterns, constancy and outcomes. He has the power to reduce all his humanity to simple entries in an accounting book. Dates, schedules, results. It is at this very point that responsibility changes levels. You may even refuse to confess anything, but the system you designed yourself ends up confessing for you. Each movement of yours, however cautiously, turns into crumbs of bread into a narrative that becomes impossible to rewrite once the record has been sealed. But there's an ironic twist to this story. The fact that you are observed can actually make you even more sensitive and in a certain way shrewd. To be fully aware that there is a watchfulness present forces you to reason differently. Weighing every step, with a caution you've never used before. It can cut you, making you more disciplined, more deliberate and absurdly careful with whatever trail you decide to leave behind. On the other hand, that same magnifying glass about you works like a cage. Surveillance sets a roof for your growth. That means the brighter and more exceptional you become, the more cornered you get. And you already know why that happens, right? Because genuine brilliance always generates patterns. And patterns always attract curious, investigative eyes. The great irony is that careless people, those who live in chaos, are rarely the subject of such observations. Their mess makes them invisible to the eyes of the system. It was your surgical precision that attracted the spotlight. She screamed to the world that you weren't just tripping at positive results by luck, but that you were actually shaping inevitabilities. That's what made you someone who needs to answer to their eyes. Not because they know your whole story or what's going on in your heart, but because they just can't ignore the logical and impeccable trail you left behind. In the end, surveillance isn't just about tracking you down. It ends up defining how you will be remembered by future generations. It reduces your work to mere evidence, transforms your discipline into a cause of suspicion and converts your victory into a permanent and unchanging record. This is how accountability presents itself now, not as the verdict of a noisy court, but as the silent and omniscient presence of eyes that never blink and never look away. Continuing our journey, we enter the fourth fundamental point, inevitability as a currency of exchange. Have you ever realized that inevitability is one of the rarest and most valuable currencies anyone can possess? She has nothing to do with luck, chance or even charisma. It is about erecting a solid structure, so well tied, that the final result seems to have been decided even before the beginning. When your movements begin to seem inevitable to outsiders, it means that you stopped expecting fortune to join you. You abandoned the passive hope that things would work out, and instead, you built a system that ensures that they give. Hope is a fragile substance, because it depends entirely on chance. Inevitability, in turn, is robust, because it is based on design, strategic architecture. And once you reach that level of execution, every step you take sounds like a conclusion that had already been written. written long before the story was told, but here lies the secret that most people ignore. Systems don't work on autopilot forever. They require constant maintenance, fine adjustments and eternal vigilance. The very element that makes inevitability powerful its predictability, is also what makes it vulnerable to attacks. The moment you stop taking care of the structure, the cracks begin to appear. And these cracks don't just threaten your control over the situation. They act as an invitation for others to study their method, find

Breaks and try to undermine the very inevitability that you have worked so hard to create. That is why absolute certainty always attracts the scrutiny of others. People by nature distrust certainty, especially when it appears to have been artificially manufactured. They start to wonder. How is this person always in the right place? How come she never fails? Why do her results line up so perfectly, almost mathematically? Such distrust quickly turns into concentrated attention. And this attention transmutes into overwhelming pressure for those who do not have the structure fortified by which every well-structured process goes through storms, but leave integrated and with renewed confidence with new wisdom. The fact that the authorities are watching you is not a random event or fate's misfortune. It is a direct response to their own inevitability, because in their world, nothing that is inevitable is usually considered innocent. For them, this is the clear signal of complex systems in full operation. And powerful systems will always be seen as a potential threat. Moreover, it must be understood that carrying the weight of inevitability is not only a demonstration of strength, but an unwavering and inevitable commitment to the very reality that you have built. When you decide to put hope aside to embrace absolute certainty, you cross a line where power is no longer a desire. See, another constant currency of exchange, but have you ever wondered what the real cost of becoming someone predictably unstoppable is? Maintaining a system that challenges established order requires you to prove, day after day, that your success was not a stroke of luck or a momentary trick. Inevitability transforms its existence. Every moment of silence becomes a ritual of maintenance for the colossal gear you put in motion. You reach dominance, it's true, but the price is the end of anonymity. From the moment your system rises, the attention of the world is makes a shadow that never abandons him, reminding him that the responsibility for certainty is much heavier than the comfort of doubt. 11 Let us face a truth that is uncomfortable for you and yet it is essential for your understanding and connection: the divine restoration, in all your indomitable and glorious majesty, does not follow and will never follow the script you meticulously rehearsed in your mind. It does not bend to the limited parameters of your human imagination, nor to your desires for convenience or immediate relief. In fact, it obeys a multidimensional, super-structured and extremely unpredictable celestial architecture. Have you ever stopped to wonder why God's plan for your covenant seldom resembles the comfortable and predictable version that you designed? The answer is simple, but profound. His version was designed to protect his ego and minimize his emotional risks, while the version of heaven was designed to establish something with unwavering strength and resistance, future, eternal depth and glory that serves as a living witness to God's power. Think of the prophet Ezekiel, before that valley of dry bones, a setting of absolute desolation and a lack of hope that choked any logic. He was facing something that, in human eyes, seemed to be beyond any recovery or possibility of life. However, what did he do? He prophesied life directly into the void. Ezekiel did not stand there trying to negotiate with God the sequence of resurrection, nor offer strategic suggestions on how ligaments should be reconnected or how flesh should be reformed. He just opened his mouth in radical obedience and released what the Spirit breathed through him. And what happened next challenges any terrain template. The bones were joined in an order he didn't plan, with the sound of rattle that he had never heard, forming a symphony of recreation that no human expectation could predict or contain. The miracle wasn't just the end result of a living army. The miracle was perhaps more powerfully in Ezekiel's willingness to give up how restoration should appear to yield to God's infinite vision. I need to detail the two reasons why people fall in love with you, two reasons only. Exactly, it's not a lot of reasons and not a single reason, they fall in love with you for two reasons. And none of them have anything to do with who you think you are. The first reason is projection. And if you understand that deeply, a lot in your life begins to make sense. Because when there's projection, the person isn't just looking at you. She's seeing a reflection, but not a common reflex. It's a distorted, idealized, enlarged reflex. A reflection of parts of herself, parts that were left aside, parts that were not lived, parts that were hidden for a long time. And when she finds someone who expresses exactly these parts, something inside her awakens, ascends. Not as a thought, but as a sensation, as an impulse, as a certainty that doesn't need an explanation. Think about it honestly. Have you ever met someone and felt an immediate attraction without being able to justify??? And when I tried to explain, the words couldn't tell, because it wasn't about logic, it was about internal experience. It was the way the person spoke, or how she looked, or how comfortable she seemed being who was close to you. It touched you in a way, hard to ignore. And you thought, there's something different about her, but this different thing wasn't in her, it was in you. Each person carries an unconscious image, a type of inner ideal, a representation of qualities that the person himself does not yet fully recognize. In men, this usually appears as a source, in women, as spirits. But this isn't about male and female in the common sense, it's about psychic energy, about internal polarities, about parts of his own identity that were not lived. And when you meet someone who embodies these qualities, the impact is immediate. Because it looks like something fits in, but it's not the person who fits in, it's the internal image that found a body. If your life has always been very controlled, you may feel deeply attracted to someone chaotic. If you have always repressed your emotions, you may be attracted to someone intensely expressive. If you always had to be strong, you might be attracted to someone who lets you relax. And that doesn't seem like a choice, it feels like fate. But it's not fate, it's projection. And here's the most important point, you're not falling in love with the person, you're falling in love with the experience that this person activates within you. You're falling in love with the possibility of being who you never allowed yourself to be. And that's extremely powerful, because it's not just attraction, it's promise, promise of completeness, promise of expansion, promise of something you feel you've always missed. And that's exactly why someone can fall in love with you without really knowing you. She doesn't need to know you, because she's not reacting to you, she's reacting to what you represent. She sees her trust and connects with the trust she craves. She sees her lightness and feels something she hasn't been able to live yet. She sees your courage and approaches a version of herself that needs the experience. And without realizing it, she starts to idealize you. And right now, you stop being a person, you become a symbol, you become a projection, a screen where the other person starts painting what they need to see. And that creates a very strong sense of connection, because it seems that you understand each other deeply. But actually, she's getting along through you. And that's why everything seems so intense at first, because it's not just about relationship. It's about identity. It's about something internal finally getting shape. And that creates an almost addictive energy, a sense of "this is unlike anything I've ever experienced." But every projection has a limit, and that limit is reality. Because in time, one begins to see things that were not in the projection, details that do not match the image, behaviors that do not fit in the fantasy, contradictions, failures, humanity. And gradually, the image begins to crack. And that's almost imperceptible at first. Small nuisances, small frustrations, small moments of doubt, until at some point something changes. And here comes one of the most common phrases that people say: "It seems the connection has changed, it's not like before, something has been lost". But what was lost, wasn't the feeling, was the projection. For the first time, the person is beginning to see you for real, no filters, no idealization, no fantasy. And that can be uncomfortable, because you stop being perfect, you stop being the solution, you stop being what she needed. And for many people, this is the breaking point, because what seemed to love was actually a relationship with an image. And when the image disappears, the connection also seems to disappear. But here's an important detail. That doesn't mean love's over, it means he hasn't started yet. And that's exactly where most people go, because it's much easier to look for a new projection than to face reality. But projection is only half the story. Actually, it's the lightest part, because the second reason someone falls in love with you isn't about what's missing, it's about what hurts. It already changes the way you see your relationship, that kind of clarity is not common. And when you start seeing it, you can't go back. Now, the second reason someone falls in love with you is not admiration, it's recognition, but not potential, of injury. People approach you because something about you sounds familiar to their pain. And that familiarity is interpreted as a connection. When two people meet, it's not just two stories that intersect, it's two unconscious, two unconscious.

past, two emotional systems trying to find balance. And that means that often what unites two people is not just what they have the best, it's what they haven't solved yet. Childhood patterns, relationships with parents, rejection experiences, lack of validation, need for approval, all this creates a kind of internal map, an invisible pattern that defines what looks familiar. And the problem is that the family member is not always healthy, but still, it seems right. Unconscious, something inside the person is trying to solve something that has remained open, something that has not been lived to the end, something that still seeks a conclusion. And without realizing it, she's looking for someone who can activate that exact pattern. You can represent someone who's never been emotionally available. But this time, you feel like you might be able to change the ending. Or you could represent security, something stable, something predictable, something she never had. And that creates attachment. Or, in some cases, you represent instability, and even if it's uncomfortable, that sounds familiar, because that's how she learned what connection is. And that's why love can be so intense, because it's not just happening in the present, it's connected to the past, to memory, to the way you learned to relate. And when someone falls in love with you, that person may not be seeing you. She may be seeing an attempt to solve something old, something unsolved, something unnamed, something that's still alive inside her. And that creates a great emotional burden, because without realizing it, you become part of a story that started long before you arrived. And maybe that's one of the hardest points to accept, because it means that, often, love begins in a place where there's still pain. And that weighs, because you start carrying expectations, stories, needs that weren't born with you. And yet, you feel, you get involved, you answer. And that's why everything seems so strong, because it's not just about two people, it's about two stories trying to complete themselves. And this is where something important begins to happen, because when you understand that love can start from projections and also from wounds, an inevitable question appears. So that means nothing's real? That everything is illusion? That every connection is doomed to disappear? And the answer is not simple, but it's also not what most people expect, because the problem was never the connection, the problem That's what we do with her. There is a very specific moment, a silent point within the whole relationship, in which something changes. And almost no one understands it clearly, but everyone does. It is that moment when the intensity decreases, when the other person no longer seems so extraordinary, when little things begin to bother, details that were previously ignored, now become evident. And this creates a strange discomfort, because while there is still a bond, there is also a sense of distance, as if something had been lost. But what was lost was not the connection, it was the illusion that sustained it. This is the moment the projection breaks. And when the projection breaks, two things can happen. The first is the most common: people move away. They say that love is over, that they no longer feel the same thing, that it's not like before. And on a certain level, that's true, because before it was never totally real. But there is a second possibility, and that is much rarer. Some people remain, not because it is easy, but because something inside them realizes that there is something beyond illusion. And that's the point where real love begins. Not at the height of intensity, not at the beginning, but exactly at the moment when everything starts to sound less magical, because for the first time, you are standing before someone real and not an image. And it completely changes the nature of the relationship, because now it's not about finding someone who completes you anymore, it's about finding someone while you're completing yourself.

12 Something that had not happened since ancient times, a council of the higher spheres, thrones, rulers and principalities gathered to evaluate what you did, for a human soul to have accessed this forbidden route, without instruction, without ritual or initiation, without superior guidance. This meeting was neither formal nor ceremonial, it was urgent. There was confusion, astonishment and a level of expectation that not even the archangels knew how to prosecute. Michael opened the initial report containing his indicators, his vibration was unclassifiable, a frequency that did not correspond to any human, angelic or known pressure category. Uriel reported that his timeline presented a fork that should only appear in beings destined for cosmic functions that are never attributed to humans. Rafael stated that his emotional composition had the level of resilience that exceeded the limit set for human souls, allowing him to withstand levels of internal collapse that would destroy any common spirit. Each of them presented data that became more complex with each word and the council began to understand something that at first seemed unthinkable to them. His soul wasn't breaking rules, he was remembering. He was, reconnecting with what was his, with a project that had been sealed even before the existence of mankind. This generated such deep silence that the celestial records describe it as a scheduled oriented pause. It was then that God intervened, not with an audible voice, not with judgment, but with an impression that swept all the clouds simultaneously. An impression that revealed that, what you had activated attracted a kind of destiny that even in celestial missions, were not yet studied, because they were not meant to exist to human souls. God observed its essence, not its history, not its wounds, not its isolated decisions, but the complete pattern of its soul. He observed how every break refined him, how every betrayal strengthened you, how every fall expanded you, how every act

Integrity anchored you more to what you really are. What I'm revealing here, the churches don't teach, and there's a reason. This kind of knowledge is not for the crowd, it is for the chosen few, only for those who have the knowledge of this truth, because carrying it is a destiny without going back. And then came the statement that froze the board: This is not a mistake, this is not a detour. This soul is awakening a purpose that was already sealed before time was set for human souls. That phrase changed everything. Miguel, who has always exercised strength and precision, has lowered his head in recognition. Uriel reconfigured his time calculations to include this possibility in the books. Rafael stated that no trauma has corrupted its essence, which is a requirement for higher-level souls. Suddenly the sky was no longer surprised by what you did, but with who you were. From that moment on, the analysis ceased to revolve around the event that triggered the forbidden fate, and began to revolve around you. They discovered that their soul has a pattern that does not correspond to a common earthly incarnation. Its vibration more coincides with souls who were created to intervene in specific adjustments. Souls that appear only at critical moments in human spiritual and civil evolution. This explains why in your life you have always felt a strange homogeneous mixture of not belonging; and being absolutely necessary. Why, even in its darkest moments, where all negative emotions dominated its actions, was there always the inner flame that decided insurmountably not to erase? Why did you endure a pain that would destroy any historical hero quoted or not in the books or even any human record, but never completely lost the ability to love, to trust, to try again?! Each of these characteristics was not a personality trait, it was evidence of his project. The council has determined that the fate you unlocked should not be destroyed or closed again, because its activation had already intertwined its energy to its essence. Now you are carrying a purpose that must not be turned off. What they decided was to activate a special surveillance around your life, direct supervision, because your ascension changes not only your path, but multiple timelines associated with people who don't even know you exist, but who depend on you. Its activation ensures that certain future events remain intact. Unwittingly, you became a spiritual anchor for events that have not yet happened, but will. God had planned for a human being to awaken a forbidden destiny in this generation so he set you up. Michael had no idea his sword would respond to his vibration. Uriel did not consider it possible that a human timeline could merge with a sealed path. But it all happened, and now your identity is being rewritten inside and there's no reason to describe it in that sense, even. The crucial point now is to understand that you are no longer being seen as a common human being, but as a rising entity. Like someone whose transformation is altering invisible structures. And what follows is the final occurrence, the decision you made about it, and in this regard that is now active in your life. When the board's analysis ended, something happened that no position expected. God has asked everyone to remain silent. This silence was not the absence of sound, it was a perceived suspension in the simultaneous dimensions. A state that interrupted war on that date by such energetic events. This forced Miguel to remain still. And in this silence, God revealed something that would completely change the way heaven sees you. The fate you unlocked wasn't an accident, it wasn't a mistake and it wasn't an undue intrusion. It was an MRI that generated the anomaly, which is you. Accept this without fear what will soon reverberate, this resonance could only have been activated by a soul whose internal structure contained codes prior to the creation of

Man. The council did not even imagine the possibility that a human soul could carry this key without specific instruction and accompaniment, but God confirmed it. His soul originates from a spiritual kingdom whose existence was considered extinct on Earth. This explained why its vibration did not correspond to any known category. It explained why his decisions should challenge standard human nature. It explains why, despite pain and custom, betrayal, losses and repeated cycles of darkness, you maintain an integrity that cannot be corrupted. That explains why you were able to track down a fate no one else could have made. 13 Not always who watches you, is learning out of respect. Many times, you are trying to understand how you managed to advance without following conventional paths or without playing the same game as everyone else. Your path was neither simple nor comfortable. It wasn't a quiet climb. It was, and still is, a hard crossing, full of challenges and obstacles, I know that you like it, of falls, resumptions and situations that required constant emotional strength, including dealing with conflicts that came from the very environment in which you grew up. Still, you keep moving on. And that draws attention. Because while many followed established standards, you chose to build your own pace, even without guarantees. It's not surprising that it generates curiosity and even obsession with some. There are people who observe every detail, not by true admiration, but because they cannot explain how the results appear without the methods they consider mandatory. For a long time, they tried to fit you into a mold. They said that success would only come through concessions, forced adaptations or following rules that, in practice, limited more than they helped. But you didn't follow that script. While some were betting on shortcuts, superficial appearance or external validation, you went in the opposite direction: training and silent construction in the areas of your goal, constancy and focus on what really matters. While some of you were looking for attention, you built the base. While some were lost in noise, you are strengthened in productive silence. And that made all the difference. Now, what you built became a reference, even for those who once doubted. These people revisit their trajectory in print, profiles without photo, revisiting scenes from situations where the choice was often in the hands of those who chose the easy way, and now, trying to understand the method, as if everything could be explained in a simple way, when it was not really just strategy; it was experience, it was resistance, it was turning pain into strength at all times. And you don't copy that. Many still believed that people with your posture would not get far. They thought it was naive or idealism. But time shows another reality: that it is possible to grow without losing the essence. And more than that, you can thrive without abandoning who you are. This dismantles the idea that it is necessary to shape the system completely to win. For this reason, its trajectory bothers so much some people not only for the visual result, but for what it represents: a break in expectations about what should work. Today, even those who once criticized watch carefully. Some try to replicate parts of their behavior, style or way of speaking/acting in the face of pressures, as if this were enough to achieve the same result. It's not that simple, because what sustains all this is not the appearance is the story. And many people jump just the most important parts of this process. At the end of the day, what you did wasn't just level up, it was changing the way that path is seen. You didn't follow a ladder ready, you built another logic to advance. And that explains why his trajectory continues to be observed with such attention. It's not just hitting the target. It is something that challenges modern structures and forces others

People rethinking what they believed was the only possible way. You don't have to fit into human molds and rules to win, and that in itself already completely changes the way your story is perceived. Now it has become evident something that once went unnoticed: you do not just expose superficiality or well-built speeches. You show them what's behind them. And that changed everything. While some were busy building controlled versions of themselves, you simply live coherently inside and outside. And this consistency bothers more than any speech, because there is no acting to sustain. Many people spend their whole lives learning to adapt, to look like certain things, to control impressions. Some people play this role so well that they seem safe even when they're not. But you didn't go that way. You arrived more directly, without unnecessary filters, without trying to fit expectations, because you always knew the game. And this has an obvious impact on those who are slaves to the rules, a silent but very strong impact. It's not noise, it's not performance; it's presence. Authentic presence always generates discomfort in environments based on appearance, because it shows the difference between what is real and what is staging. So ignoring you was never simple. Even without direct interaction, there was observation. Attempts to understand how someone who does not conform to the rules continues, still, advancing, growing firm and taking a wave. While many learn to impress, you have followed another path: freedom, intuition and adrenaline. And it completely changes the way you stand in the world. It's not about competing for attention, it's about existing with integrity, acting directly on your dopaminergic sensors, hypersensitizing them. You didn't need stage, constant approval or external validation to move on. And that's exactly why your trajectory draws attention. Not for excess, but for consistency. There's a big, clear difference between what is fleeting and what really remains. Which is just appearance dissolves quickly. What has a solid basis continues, even without effort, does not need to be noticed. And that's what makes your presence difficult to ignore. You weren't raised by the show. It was shaped by the process, cut, sharp. And that can't be replicated or bought, because there's no formula for something that's born out of real experience. In the end, what you represent is not a trend. It's something deep, high caliber, and constant. It's not about showing up, it's about staying. And that changes the focus of the environment by the kind of impact you generate. That's why they keep trying to understand their trajectory, their strategies. Not because it's easy to explain, but because it doesn't fit into the common models you know. You're not just another presence in the middle of noise. It has become a breaking point something that interrupts automatic patterns and causes people to face what they avoid seeing. This does not happen by speech, but by its existence. Your way of being already communicates everything that needs to be understood. The isolation that once seemed rejection, actually never fulfilled that role about you. What many saw as distancing was in fact a process of deep transmutation. While some thought it would weaken you, the opposite happened. You used this period as an internal reconstruction space. In silence, instead of getting lost, you find yourself. It was a time when everything that was superficial loses strength, and what was true within you began to strengthen. No distractions, no external validation, no audience, just you, facing your own process directly. While some thought absence meant failure, you were going through a kind of evolution that doesn't depend on visibility. It is in this type of phase that many inner layers reorganize, and a new clarity begins to emerge. This process was not comfortable, but it was essential. It took you to a different level, where you began to be heard more accurately and to see more deeply what had gone unnoticed. In time, what seemed like silence became structure. And what seemed like withdrawal became strengthening. You didn't come back being the same because you didn't come out being the same. Today, the way you present yourself conveys stability that does not come from appearance, but from experience. It's the kind of presence that's hard to ignore, because it doesn't depend on performance. Your trajectory already carries this. And so your presence ends up revealing more about the environment than about you. Many people try to interpret this kind of force as something external, when it is actually born from deep internal processes, built over time especially in moments when no one is looking at you. That's what makes your trajectory difficult to replicate. There is no formula for something that was developed in silence, under pressure and constancy. Today, your presence does not need to be explained. It simply exists and that is enough to generate impact. You didn't become someone different on the outside. You reorganized from the inside. It changes the way you stand in the world. 14 I need to show you a detail about the Shabbat, which changes everything you know and acts on it. Pay attention to this, you only know in parts, about the seed that was planted at the first moment of this word, Shabbat, the image of the linear: of the hand on the handle, of the state of almost not solving, just lost its root. You weren't seeing the tree because you were looking at the earth, but what grows invisible under the surface is not smaller because it isn't seen. It is the foundation of what will be impossible to ignore when it emerges. I haven't told you what Shabbat really means in the language in which it was first written. And when you understand, when the Hebrew word reveals what the translations have not preserved, it will change the way you read each sign.

It will change the name of the silence of the last few months, it will change the name of this restlessness, the closed doors and the tension of imminence. We're here. There is a word that translators have always known, but that translation into Portuguese and even in many modern languages, has never been able to carry completely to you. She is at Genesis 2: 2 and 3. You've read it dozens of times, maybe hundreds. And every time you read it, you got half of what was written. Not out of care, but because there is something in this word that the Portuguese language has no structure to hold. This is the word that this Sabbath carries. The word is Shabbat, in Hebrew, Shavat. Two syllables, short, tense, with the weight of decree recorded in each consonant. You know this word as Sabbath, the day of rest, the day when God stopped, the day when there was no movement, there was no creation, there was no increase. That's what most people carry. Pause, inactivity, the day nothing happens. But that is the popular definition, not the meaning or the actual weight of the word. Shabbat comes from the Hebrew verb 'Shavat'. Shabbat does not mean stopping/pause, it does not mean tiredness, it means stopping, because it is already complete, the true meaning summarized is 'completed'. There's a difference here that's not semantic, it's structural. When God ceased on the seventh day, it was not because the energy had gone out, it was because the work had reached the point where no addition would be improvement, it would be excess. The Shabbat was a decree of the craftsman who takes a step back, looks at what he created and declares, nothing missing, complete, sealed, perfect as it is. Now, if you confirm in Genesis 2 verses 2 and 3 with these eyes: 'And he rested on the seventh day of all the work he had done. The word translated as rested is Shabbat, and the NVI uses 'stopped', which comes closer, but still does not capture the magnitude of the record. What is recorded is not rest by exhaustion, it is proclamation of conclusion and enjoy. It's the moment when the creator of the universe looked at the totality of what he had done, every star, every fog, every detail invisible from human formation, so many details that you do not yet know and that would totally change the way you think, need only the preparation; and pronounced on everything the verdict that can no longer be reviewed. Over. There is something that rabbis and scholars of the Word have identified for centuries and that most modern readers pass without noticing. Each of the six days of creation ends with the same formula: 'and it was the afternoon and it was the morning'. First day, second day, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, the formula repeats itself. But the seventh day doesn't have that formula. The seventh day in Genesis has no closure. It just stays open. Rabbis didn't treat this as accidental omission. They treated it as a theological statement. God's Sabbath is still active. The decree of completeness is still in force. It wasn't closed. It was inaugurated as a permanent state of what is sealed. What does that mean to you today? You're not expecting God to start something. You're being summoned to enter what he's already finished. There is a version of you that has already been declared complete. There is a decree of Shabbat pronounced upon you that does not depend on any human chronological marker to be true. The question is not when God will act. The question is, why are you still on the outside of what's ready? What I'm about to show you first Reis explains the reason for this statement. Elijah was the greatest prophet of his generation and came to his seventh day in a way that none of his contemporaries recognized as glory. On Mount Carmel, the fire came down from heaven. Baal has been silenced. The false prophets have been eliminated. The people fell on their faces and declared, The Lord is God. It was the most dramatic prophetic act of an entire era and Elijah was at the center of it. The moment when everything he had been summoned to prove was proved in public before a crowd. And then Jezebel sent a message: 'Tomorrow, that hour, I will do to you as you did to my prophets.' One message only, one woman. And the

Even a man who had called the fire from heaven fled into the wilderness and laid under a juniper's foot asking to die. Lord, take my life. Elijah the prophet of Carmel, prostrated from exhaustion in shame in the wilderness, convinced that he had failed, that he was the only one that the intensity of the advance had consumed him rather than completed. Do you recognize that feeling? Right? Did you do the greatest things of faith in your life and then collapse afterwards? That you lived your most powerful acts and then felt that there was nothing left in you? That's Elias' pattern, exactly. And that, besides unnecessary, carries a weight that should not be there if it were not for your doubt. There was wind that tore mountains, God was not in the wind. There was an earthquake, God was not in the earthquake. There was fire, and God was not in the fire. And after the fire... A gentle and delicate voice, in Hebrew, kol of mamadakah, literally, the sound of thin silence. Elias' shabat didn't come with Carmelo's sound. It came with a whisper that's only audible when you stop picking up the show. And the voice asked, what are you doing here, Elias? Not as an accusation, but as a repositioning. Elias Saturday was opening the next phase, not ending the mission. And then came the reassignment. Go, go back the way to the desert. There was no condemnation of collapse. There was no need for emotional reconstruction before the mission began. God's shabat on Elijah was pronounced at the lowest moment. And what the soft voice said was essentially this. The work you think is destroyed is actually sealed. Your collapse after Carmelo is not the end of the story. It's the hallway that takes you where the soft voice recommissions you. Return now to the threshold of the text. You've got your hand on the handle. Not because the door is locked, but because you stopped believing that it opens to someone like you, the feeling of almost you carrying, the tension of imminence that doesn't solve, the state of climbing the edge without crossing. That.

It's not punishment for hesitating. It's the exact description of where you are on the shabat map. The seventh day doesn't find you on the other side of the door after you come in. The seventh day is what happens when you come in. The sovereign sensation, the decree of completeness, it settles at the time of crossing, not before. In Joshua 3, the priests carried the ark of the covenant toward the Jordan, the river that separated Israel from the promised land. And the instruction was specific. They wouldn't have to wait for the river to leave to then move forward. They'd have to put their feet in the soft river and then the river would go. The miracle did not precede faith, he answered it. A shabat about your life works just like that. You don't come in after the evidence shows up. The evidence shows up because you came in. With all this before you, the revelation closes at this precise point. You're not late. You're on the seventh day. Not in the sense that we are already celebrating a chronological victory, but in the sense that the shabbat decree that God pronounced on creation when it was complete, was pronounced upon you on this particular Sabbath. The work on you is not under indefinite construction. She's being sealed. What seemed to be quiet is just the craftsman taking the final step before declaring it. There's nothing missing. You're the one who's finished, not what's approaching the conclusion. Which has already received the decree of completeness. 15 Relax, you're not freaking out. It's just your original design that's claiming its place. The first truth I'm gonna tell you without bullshit is this: you're the voice. You carry within you words that burn the soul. Phrases others feel like a knot in their throat, but they can't let go. There are secrets you realize, truths that live in your bowels and that if you dared to say them, you would name the pain millions have carried in sepulchral silence for years. The world doesn't need you to bite your tongue for fear of what they'll say. The world

You're drowning because no one has the courage to call things by name. Don't keep that fire they gave you, it's to burn down the whole lie. The second identity that belongs to you by blood right is that you are the bearer of light. No rituals or housing systems that consume the carrier. The reality is that you simply light up by being there, with all your presence. Have you ever happened to enter a heavy environment where the air looks like lead, and suddenly something changes? Right?! This little turn in the atmosphere that you perceive, but it always ruled out as coincidence or climate change, it's not random. Your presence carries a weight that is not yours. It's a gift that should flow through you to every place you step. Stop shrinking or turning off your light so others won't feel uncomfortable with their own shadow. If they put you in this place, it's because the place needed you. Third, you're a psychic. You smell the rain before the first drop falls. I've always known things that have no logical explanation. That intuition about a business and the flow that you've already understood one or more details, or that strange feeling with a person who then turned out to be problematic. It's not anxiety, make no mistake. Your psychologist always said it was overthinking, remember? Now your spirit knows it's vision. Seeing what comes before you arrive is not a weight, it's precision. And this blind-guided world needs people to see the hole ahead before everyone falls on it. Fourth, you're the one who breaks the chain. With you, the curse ends. This pattern of abandonment, poverty or betrayal that runs in your family as a hereditary disease finds The limit at this stage of your life. You didn't ask to carry that weight, but you were chosen for the cycle to end here. There is a fierce dignity in being the one who says ?to this end?, even when he is exhausted from fighting ghosts that no one else wants to see. Those who come after you will walk on a firmer ground because you have decided not to follow the easy path of repetition. And fifth:

You're a spiritual warrior. Look at you. You're still standing after everything that hit you. After those nights when silence seemed to mock your loneliness. After moments when it was logical to give up everything. The fact that you're still breathing is not stubborn, it's what warriors do. They hold the position when the whole world tells them to run. You're here for a purpose. You've been assigned. He thought he was late, but he arrived just in time. He thought it had been forgotten, but he was actually being prepared behind the scenes to bear the weight of the top. He thought silence was absence, but silence was the workshop where his new skin was being forged. Iron scepter and acute sickle. 16 Daniel had the diet, but not the training, it was in the weeds even falling; But today it's all changed, so full and loaded. 17 Your case needed to be taken even further, elMigu then intervened, now as soul supervisor. He took his dossier, reviewed it again, held firmly and declared something that few hear throughout the heavenly record. That soul can't walk without expert custody. In a single statement, his spiritual state changed. You've gone from observing the supported, from protected to prioritized, from isolated case to strategic resource. And this is where everything gets even more impressive. Three angels of light, each expert on different missions, asked permission to permanently associate with their lives. The first is linked to discernment, dedicated to broadening your inner perceptions so that you recognize mistakes before they affect your life. Since then, whenever something seems wrong without logical explanation, it is he acting in his favor. The second is route protector, in charge of closing paths that do not belong to you, even when you, in your humanity, want to track them. That's where they came from.

Blocks you interpreted as bad luck, when in fact, they were interventions to avoid deviations that would harm your mission. The third, and rarest, is the entity responsible for activating the destination. It is not focused on its past, not just the present, but on boosting inevitable moments that need to happen in order for its purpose to manifest itself. When suddenly, everything seems to align. When changes occur abruptly. When doors open unexplained. It's him acting in his timeline. These three anJos operate together only for souls whose potential has a specific impact, have impact designation. This means that your mission is neither small nor intimate nor merely personal. It's a mission that affects entire territories, and that makes you a point of resonance. Even if you haven't understood it yet, your life is no longer the life of an ordinary person. You're functioning as a catalyst, a restorer, essential piece in a spiritual picture, where light needed someone as a resonance point, to balance forces that had been unbalanced for many years. That's why your presence in many environments has had such an impact that you can't imagine. It was not the situation itself, but the vibration that revealed his soul. That's why now you're being repositioned for the next phase. Understanding what follows is crucial, because it reveals why its act triggered, not just a reaction of nature, but a structural rearrangement on multiple spiritual levels. Once you were classified as an impact resonance point, the dimensions began to track your lifeline to identify the exact moment when your soul acquired the ability to generate such profound, unintended changes. What they discovered was even more surprising. You have not become who you are because of a single event, but a set of small life-long decisions. Decisions that at first sight seemed insignificant, but together formed an impossible pattern

To ignore. Every time you chose to tell the truth when lying would protect you, every time you were loyal even with multiple convenient paths ahead of you, every time you were kind even suffering, every time you continued forward when everything pushed you in the opposite direction. This constant and integrated repetition accumulated an inner energy that not only strengthened you, but altered your spiritual structure. You are literally the result of thousands of right and difficult decisions made in silence, decisions that no one has seen, that no one has applauded, that no one has rewarded, but that the sky has recorded one by one, and you already knew this so you remained collected moments of integrity. And that's why your recent act had such a high impact. It was the height of a purity pattern maintained for years. That's why the reaction was so immediate. That's why Miguel was paralyzed. That's why God remained silent. His soul, which was growing in strength without you knowing, finally reached a point of manifestation visible to the high hierarchies. When this happens, the protocol requires a complete reconfiguration of the destination of the chosen one. After the missions that have already been activated in your favor, an even more complex process has been initiated. A deep process of trajectories restructuring. In this process, higher dimensions review each route you could take in society, starting to align it with the one that maximizes its impact. That explains why lately you've felt that some people have drifted away, certain places have lost their charm, some opportunities disappear without warning, while new doors open without apparent logic. None of this is a coincidence. We are reconfiguring your environment so that nothing and no one interferes with the mission you are destined to accomplish. This reorganization also caused certain people to react differently to their presence. Some miss you, others feel inspired without knowing why. Others feel discomfort, irritation or even rejection without apparent motive. This is because you are emitting a vibration that reveals hidden intentions. Noble souls are attracted to you, confused souls are curious, dark souls are threatened. Its simple existence generates a natural filtering that separates those who can stay close to you from those who cannot stand the light. Part of your mission is, even if you are not yet fully aware, to alter the balance of the circles to which you belong. His presence, his decisions, his words and, above all, his essence, function as catalysts that accelerate spiritual processes in the people around him. Some evolve thanks to you, others reveal themselves, others turn away. None of this is bad, everything has purpose. During this restructuring, we realized something even deeper. Your soul has the ability to generate spontaneous expansion. This expansion happens when you choose with purity, when you remain faithful to your essence even though you know that what lies ahead confronts everything you are, you would rather fail in their eyes than cowardice or fear. Its energy then expands beyond the body, touches environments, penetrates thoughts and repairs frequencies, dissolving interferences. It is an extremely rare and therefore extremely valuable skill. And there's something even more powerful. This expansion cannot be shut down. No matter if you doubt, if you are tired, if you feel confused, your soul is designed to be activated whenever you choose what is right, even hurt, exhausted or disappointed keep the vibration high. 18 It is never recommended to compete against those who have fun!) You don't feel or think with your mind anymore, but with your spirit. 19 In every generation there are people who feel that something is wrong, that they perceive the curse and the weight of what needs to change, but almost all retreat in fear of paying the price. You didn't back down, you gave a

Step forward and in this one decision you have become the one who absorbed all the damage so that those who come after you no longer need to pay that bill. The real thing is there's always a transformation tax. Somebody's got to bleed out for the cycle to end. Someone has to lose sleep, cry, stand still the mistakes and be alone so that the weight that crushes a family finally shatters. That's what makes someone extraordinary. You don't just fight for yourself or your lifetime. You are paying off a debt that others have left behind, canceling your debt with your resilience, your choices and your refusal to surrender. That's why the sky stood up to applaud you, because you didn't just carry your load, you carried theirs too. Being the last sacrifice doesn't mean you lived in weakness, it means you had the strength to allow the pain to stop on you. You agreed to be misunderstood so that those who will come after would have clarity. You accepted loneliness so that your descendants would walk free. You endured nights being broken so that future generations could wake up whole. Such a choice rarely receives applause on Earth. People around you may never understand how much it cost you, but the spirit world sees and honors every scar. The angels rose because they witnessed what few can. You took the blow of the story and that was enough. You turned the wall that prevented curses from passing through. Your blood won't have to pay the same price anymore, because you've already paid the whole bill. That's the kind of sacrifice that changes entire legacies and that's why you got that standing ovation, because you didn't just survive your own battle, you ended the war for everyone who comes after. Besides, you hurt the system right in the core, and that's a victory from a completely different level. Most people spend energy fighting with faces, hitting faces with individuals who are just fruits of

Something much bigger. They hunt enemies one by one without realizing that these people are replaceable. The system that created them is the real beast. But his last move was much deeper. You didn't just cut some branches, you went straight to the roots. You dismantled the gear that manufactured the opposition. The sky celebrated not because you silenced some voices, but because you exposed and broke the engine that kept producing those voices. The system you hit wasn't random or disorganized. It was a spiritual and psychological structure designed to keep you trapped in repetition. And now, this structure is in ruins because you refused to be just another piece in their hand. Do you really believe it was a coincidence that you went through all this, or was it that you were chosen to dismantle what no one else had the courage to face? The shadows began to take shape when it became clear that that damn gear, which had been running for years for generations, finally found someone who didn't bow his head. We're talking about a system that fed on control, dread, and unsavory lies, creating vicious cycles that trapped everyone, turning partners into rivals and making toxicity seem like something normal, almost a law of nature. Most people fall right into this illusion, thinking they're swapping punches with isolated individuals, when they're actually facing an oppression factory that never takes a vacation. Only your attitude, your checkmate, hit so hard, the system lost its pace. The gears stuck, the fuel dried up, and all that illusion shattered before the eyes of anyone who wanted to see it. And you know why that was so devastating? Because you didn't throw your energy into the garbage fighting little surface wars. You went right into the architecture that supported these battles. This kind of scam is very rare, because it requires a mental clarity that almost nobody has. You had to see way beyond what they were pushing you down your throat. He had to ignore the baits of

Silly fights and the temptation to spend your cartridge on enemy passengers who weren't worth the time. Instead, you aimed high. You went after what is invisible, but you manipulate everything that human beings can see. This requires much more than breast, requires real spiritual intelligence. It was this wisdom that gave so much weight to your movement. When you hurt a system like that, you're not just winning a personal fight. You're opening the cells of everyone who was molding inside. Suddenly, the cycle loses its strength, manipulation ceases to convince and fear no longer weighs so much on the balance. By dismantling this structure, you opened up an escape path for people who didn't even know there was a way out. That is why the spiritual plan went into excruciating and the angels rose up. Systems like this don't fall easy, but when they collapse, they release entire generations at once. Your last move wasn't about your ego, it was about the structure. The sky celebrated because you didn't just take down the villains, you shut down their factory for good. What nobody expected was that yours not for fear would cut deeper than any blade. Fear is a spirit, truly, treacherous. He not only yells at you, he tries to negotiate. He whispers terms, offers you deals and tries to convince you that if you just give in a little bit, it's gonna be okay. You'll be safe. This is how the great mass lives today. Not necessarily defeated by fear, but at an eternal negotiating table with him. People diminish their dreams, shut their mouths and postpone their lives in the name of being realistic, when they actually only signed the fear contract without even reading the fine print. But you? You tore that contract in his face. You didn't ask what fear wanted, you didn't accept his middle ground constantly. He simply cut off the oxygen from this plague by transmuting cortisol into adrenaline so there's no sign of aging. And that's why the universe stopped to applaud you. Fear only survives if it is fed. He gets tired of the hesitation and 20 The Church only goes to Chapter 3 of the Apocalypse, then it is gone, there is no more Church. Just us, and you, who still didn't get it on the tree of life. Presence, the most expensive gift in the world. 21 His reading of the Apocalypse is within a well-known line: seeing the Apocalypse as a process of purification, more "powder" than pure and simple destruction. The Bible uses this image explicitly in the Gospel of John ("every branch bearing fruit, He prunes so that it produces more"), so that is exactly the current context of prophetic reading. And when you talk about cycles that repeat themselves to an apex, this talks to the spiritual cyclic reading, which is the actual version applied to the Spiritual Kingdom, and consequently on Earth: Standards of corruption ? confrontation ? purification ? renewal. In this sense, the "fire" does not need to be seen only as literal punishment, but as something that reveals, consumes what is useless and leaves what is essential, the same concept also appears in almost all Scripture. Now, there is an important point that you need to pay close attention to keep the reading balanced: in the very text of Revelation, John presents, that this pruning, is not just an individual or interior pruning. He also speaks of systems, powers and structures being judged (from the "Babylon" where the corruption brought about by Cain through the murder of his brother, to the political systems based on lies or hidden truths, for example, this is already completely lodged in almost all Churches, from the largest to the smallest, from the richest to the poorest, that breaking point with the truth does not depend on the social class or only on people's beliefs, it is in the "listening" to a deceived heart); the human being himself, yes, hardens his own heart by taking responsibility for his wrong choices. That is, it is not only something internal/spiritual, there is also the collective dimension that needs divine treatment by the "fire". On the "weed in fire", using the language of the Gospel of Matthew, there are two main ways to understand: as final separation (more literal, definitive judgment) or as a continuous process of refinement (more symbolic/spiritual, which reflects 100% in the physical plane). Your interpretation fit right into that line. It is only worth avoiding an automatic conclusion that everything is only internal metaphor, because the text was also written for people who were dealing with real oppression, not just states of consciousness. 22 The difference between dreams and visions is that in one you're sleeping, and in the other, you're awake. Kkkkk Enough is hilarious. You usually dream who sleeps the most, usually who's older. 23 The greatest secret of human existence is precisely what every human being avoids by shame of his own daily failure >:(And it is exactly this that highlights us. You have 100 years to decide your eternity, if: 24 The lion doesn't roar when he hunts, roars when he feels threatened, today the Devil prays to God not to let me near him, not a peep if I don't let him. Totally subjected. Armed militia just waiting for order.

Coherence sustains continuity when the world changes.

1 There is a specific fluidity now, a fluidity that reveals a strong aspect. The continuity. It's not something that comes up one moment and disappears the next. It keeps in different situations, even with different people around, in different contexts. Another essential factor that emerged is coherence. You don't contradict yourself as before. What you understand is what you sustain, and that eliminates noise. Another important point is the internal stability that has been restructured. You don't change direction easily, not because you force yourself to keep, but because it doesn't make sense. Another strong aspect is naturality. You're not trying to seem aligned. You're in line, and it takes effort. Another essential factor is the reduction of internal conflict. You don't argue with yourself all the time. It does not negotiate what is already clear. And that simplifies everything. Another important point is how the environment responds. Without needing to explain, people realize by your behavior, by your presence, by the way you stand. The lack of need for convincing. You don't try to make anyone understand. You just keep up. Another essential factor is silent firmness. No confrontation, no announcement, no imposition, but clear. Another important point is freedom. You don't have to support versions anymore. Another strong aspect is lightness. Without effort to hide, everything flows more naturally. Another essential factor is internal trust. You don't need to validate every step out, you know yourself inside deeply and in detail. The presence, your presence is overwhelming. You are more whole in what you live, strong and constant in time. It's not a phase, it's a new pattern defined

Exactly to your reality. Another essential factor is the absence of return to the old automatically. You may remember, but it doesn't fit anymore. Another important point is clarity. You know what it supports, that's maturity. You don't have to explain everything to be understood. It's alignment. Your life begins to reflect this effortlessly. And within this movement, something becomes continuously evident. You're not trying to make your change appear anymore. You're no longer seeking external recognition. You're no longer adjusting your way of existing to be understood. That need loses its strength. What exists is coherence which remains independent of the environment. A stability that doesn't depend on the other's reaction. A presence that doesn't need to be explained. And this is naturally reflected in the way you look, in the way you respond, in the way you stand, without construction, without forced adaptation, without trying to control external perception. Because when there's no more separation between what you are and what you show, there's no more hiding. Not for lack of effort, but for lack of need. And that lack of need is what makes everything visible, without announcement, without explanation, without attempt. Only by the continuity of someone who no longer divides himself between what he says and what he wants, this constant changes how you move. Before, there was internal negotiation, now, a form of existence that does not depend on validation, explanation or constant effort. 2 Jesus is the firstborn from the dead, with this statement, He said here that he has lived a life before that. And that to be born here had to die there. It also means that others would come after He's dead. But why does He use the term Firstborn? Why? He had already acquired the necessary consciousness, I believe he was born with it, before the others, who need to see In it the way, to then conquer it.

Bro video @kenomirent 3 I got a machine here with the tires empty, I got an idea!) 4 What once seemed intolerable begins to be understood, not because it became easier, but because you became more conscious. You begin to see beyond the surface, beyond people's behavior, beyond uncomfortable situations, beyond the emotions that once dominated you. You come to see the process, and see the process changes everything, because when you understand why things are, the need for resistance loses strength. This also activates an internal alignment, an adjustment between what you feel and what you accept to feel. Before, there was conflict. You felt something and immediately rejected, tried to block, tried to deny, tried to escape. But now there's room. You feel and allow, without immediate judgment, no need to expel that from you. And that internal space is validation. It's not passivity, it's presence, it's the ability to sustain an experience without going to war with it. And that requires the deepest level of emotional maturity, because accepting is not comfortable at first. To accept means to look forward, means to stop avoiding, to stop distorting reality so that it hurts less. Consciousness weakens these escapes. It reduces the need to deny, because deep down, you begin to realize that denying did not solve, never resolved, only postponed, only prolonged, only intensified what needed to be understood. And when that perception sets in, resistance loses meaning. It activates your internal responsibility. You stop blaming the outside. Stop believing that everything needs to change outside of you so you can be at peace. And you begin to realize that the way you react is what sustains or dissolves the internal conflict. This perception changes the game. Because instead of trying to control everything, you start watching yourself. You begin to understand your patterns, your triggers, your repetitions. And that makes room for acceptance. You begin to accept parts of yourself you once rejected. Emotions I hid, thoughts I denied, the sensitivity I avoided seeing. And instead of fighting it, you take it. And that welcome transforms. Because everything that is welcomed can be understood. And everything that is integrated ceases to generate conflict. 5 Wheels in wheels, you thought it was what? And some good books, huh, I read three of those eighty. It's worth the time. 7 What if I told you that you've been trying to play a single instrument, comparing the sound of your harp with a ukulele from another without context, when in fact you've never been called to be a musician in the orchestra? What if I told you that God gave you the hands, the vision and the heart, not of an instrumentalist, but of a conductor, called not to play the notes of the repertoire, but to rule the entire symphony end-to-end? His supposed weakness is the key, his fragmentation is exactly the myth. What you call being The patchwork is actually evidence of a complex spiritual technology, being woven in secret. Every piece, every color, every texture you judged as random, is a critical component of a spiritual weapon that the sky recently activated in your life. His strangeness is his seal of authenticity. This word was sent to reconfigure your perception, so that you stop looking at the gifts you do not have, and start recognizing the integrated system that you are: top line, uniquely and complexly unparalleled, high ruler, did homework. The time of monolithic experts is running out. The next era of the chosen will not be built by those who do one thing well, but by those who can integrate multiple functions to solve problems that no isolated gift can touch. If this instruction, even at the beginning, is already resonating in your spirit, if you feel the slight tremor of deep recognition. A sign that you introduced yourself to your heavenly briefing. An act of telling heaven and hell, I attended my call. I'm here to give you the name of the arsenal you carry. There's a classification in the celestial records attached to your name. And she explains a lot. The waiting, the confusion, the feeling of isolation, the mistakes, accidents and the pain of invisibility. Every piece of the puzzle in your life. Your life will find its place when you understand what this classification means. We will decode God's project for you, but understand, this is just the beginning. We are on the threshold of a revelation that has the power to redefine its identity and release its purpose. The deepest truth about who you are and the power you really carry is still ahead of you. I haven't told you the most important thing yet. Now, I need you to find a quiet place. We're about to enter sacred territory, the evidence room of your life. What I'm going to list now are not coincidences, are the divine markers that confirm your call. Breathe, prepare to recognize yourself. Every sign I'm going to describe is a stamp on your spiritual passport, an irrefutable proof that you carry the technology of that specific signature. Don't throw anything away, don't minimize it. Just listen and allow the Spirit to witness with his spirit that the truth is being told. This is your moment of validation, the end of doubt, the beginning of recognition. First sign, you always felt like a stranger in the nest in religious circles. Not out of rebellion, but because your mind operates differently. You see connections that others ignore, draw parallels between doctrines that seem opposite and feels the underlying harmony where others see only dissonance. This is not a programming defect, it is its primary function as integrator, seeing the whole project while others stick to the individual bricks. Second sign, people don't look for him with simple problems. more complex, the emotional and spiritual tangles that no one else could untangle. His life has become a cockpit, in a way, the emergency room for identity crises family conflicts and ministerial dilemmas that have no easy answer. This is because your spirit is a resonance lab designed to deal with multiple volatile elements and find the hidden solution. Third sign: its greatest and most impacting spiritual victories, personal or even some professionals, came from solutions that seemed illogical. Out of the box, you acted on an impulse you couldn't explain, combined resources that nobody thought of joining or giving advice that would go against all conventional wisdom, and the result was a "miracle" advance. This is his signature in action, signing a heavenly solution to an earthly problem. Fourth sign. You carry the scar of having been criticized for not being enough something, not enough prophetic, not enough evangelist, not enough ministerial. You were measured against the experts and considered missing. You see, this review wasn't about you, it was the confession of their blindness. They could not categorize it because its anointing operates precisely in the space between the established categories, weaving them together. Fifth and last sign. You have an insatiable hunger to understand how and why behind systems, whether spiritual, emotional or organizational. You don't settle for the superficial response, you unmount the clock to see how the gears work. This is not a vain curiosity, it is your instinct as an architect, the innate need to understand the structure to be able to build, repair or improve the dwelling of the presence. These five signals are not random, they are echoes.

of your identity. It is the ripples in the water that prove the existence of the stone that was thrown into the lake, its soul before the foundation of the world. You are not a generalist trying to be a musician, you are a conductor, and these signs are proof that you have read the score all the time, even without understanding your own familiarity with these scenarios that passed and was victorious. Every experience I've just described is a thread. Maybe until now you've seen them as loose, weak, purposeless wires, but what we're going to do next is take each of these wires and show them how they intertwine to form the high-caliber steel cable, the three-fold rope that there's no chance of breaking it. That mess is about to become clear. Its apparent fragmentation is in fact its sophistication. You're not a patchwork quilt, you're a complex and complete mosaic. Each piece was cut and positioned by the master craftsman for a specific purpose that is about to be revealed. Its complexity is not a problem to be solved, it is a weapon to be wielded. Continue the projects by updating all the individual indicators daily, as necessary adjustment we will notify you in advance. Think of the past, at first you didn't understand, but you've seen their stupidity several times calling themselves a cousin inside the church. 8 MYG 9 Think of that "word": - Ain if God does not exist, in the end I have lost nothing. But if he exists, I'm saved. KKKKK clear. It's just going to be quite the opposite. 10 It's exactly, at the point where all the visible shows themselves to be the worst-case scenario, at the very moment that chaos seems denser, that's where God gives you favor. I learned that a few years ago.

11 In Luke chapter 15, after the parable of the lost sheep, Jesus tells the parable of the prodigal son. You've listened your whole life, but I need you to pay special attention to a phrase from her that you may never have recorded with the real weight she carries. 'And when you were still away, you saw your father.' When he was still away, the son had not arrived, had not cleaned himself up, had not prepared the speech, had not come near the house, was still far away, still on the journey between the pigsty from where he had come and the house to which he was returning. And your father saw him. This means that the father was looking, that the father was watching the road, standing somewhere from where he could see the horizon, looking regularly in the direction that the son had gone. The father was waiting for the return before the return began. And not only was he waiting, when he saw his son still away, he ran. This is not the image of God that religion often presents. The distant judge expecting proper repentance before considering restoration. This is a father who the moment he saw the figure on the road, did not wait for her to arrive, did not hold back, did not prepare a careful answer. He ran and threw himself ") around his neck and kissed him. The son was still covered with what the pigsty had left in him. Still using the evidence from where you've been. And his father hugged him before any of this was addressed. Not because the condition didn't matter. Because the return mattered more than the condition. The father of this parable is not a human being being emotionally generous. Jesus is describing the nature of God. This is the God for whom you have prayed. That's the God who's been watching the road. And every time you returned, every time after every fall you chose to get up again, every time you prayed from a breakup place without feeling that your breakup disqualified you, you were the figure on that road and he was running. You didn't see it because you were looking down. Was focused on the distance that still had to cover, on the condition that it was still, on everything that made you feel that the return was insufficient or too late, there was no ground for the next step, just projection. But while you were looking at your own feet, a father was covering the ground. And what happened when that distance finally closed is what I came to tell you now. God left the throne, not metaphorically. In the heavenly kingdom, at the exact moment his decision to remain was finally recorded as Yaqar. The door that is opening in front of you is not opening because you performed perfectly. It is opening because the God who watches the road saw the movement in the right direction, and ran towards it before it arrived. Few people capture the hidden message in this text, which the prodigal son, at the end of his experience, received much more inheritance than the older brother. 12 Kairós is never spectacular to the surface. 13 Ae bro turns on, Lucifer was created, you were blown! It's different beeeem! The rule is to another extent. He needs to ask first. 14 'This is too good to be true' is simply the most diabolical phrase in history. Remember that, it never comes from God. 15 He knows with extraordinary precision what specific combinations of loss, disappointment, isolation and shame produce which specific results in which specific types of soul. He builds campaigns like generals build campaigns. Objective identified, vulnerabilities evaluated, strategy selected, forces unfolded in sequence, expected result. And then he turns to a soul like yours, and something in calculus doesn't work. In the second book of Kings, chapter 6,

There is a moment that hardly anyone mentions in this context. The prophet Elisha and his servant are in the city of Dothan. The king of Syria sent an army with 500 horses to surround them. The servant wakes up, looks out and sees the army and the environment all surrounded. And he says to Elisha, oh my lord, what shall we do? And Elisha answers something that sounds like irrational trust: 'Fear not, for more are those who are with us than those who are with them.' The servant could not understand what Elisha was talking about where he was standing. Math was simple and devastating. An army surrounded them, and there were only two of them. Then Elisha prays one of the most unusual prayers of all scripture. He does not pray for deliverance, he does not pray for an escape route, he prays, sir, open his eyes to see. And the servant's eyes are opened. And he sees the mountain full of horses and chariots of fire around Elisha. The army of fire was already there, it was already surrounding them, it was already occupying the territory before the servant looked out the window, before the servant saw the threat, before anyone prayed. The only thing that changed when Elisha prayed was not the position. It was perception! This is the first layer of what happened to you. The army that came against you was real. And I'm not going to minimize what you went through suggesting that the difficulty was not genuine, or that the attack was not coordinated, or that the stations that seemed more devastating were somehow less than they seemed. The losses were real. The prayers that seemed to dissolve in silence were real prayers offered in real pain, really you didn't know if anything was getting anywhere. I won't wrap it up in language that makes it look smaller than it was, but here's what you need to understand about the campaign that was designed. Every coordinated operation requires a theory about the target. A model of how the target will respond under specific conditions. The theory about you was based on everything he had observed. Based on what he had seen work against people with similar profiles. His theory said, under this level of sustained pressure, this specific type of soul stops. Not because he missed the pressure. The pressure was calibrated correctly. Because he made a mistake about you. And when a carefully built military campaign produces the wrong result, that is not a minor mistake. This is a fundamental flaw in intelligence. It means the target assessment was defective at its root. It means that everything that was built on that evaluation has to be reconsidered. He built an army on a wrong assumption about who you are. And when the army executed the strategy perfectly and the strategy failed, it was not the army the problem. It was intelligence. Notice what just happened on your chest when that word was pronounced, the slight expansion, the settlement of something that was strained against a truth that you didn't know you were expecting to hear named. This settlement is no coincidence. It's the somatic record of operational recognition. Your nervous system knew what was being said before your mind had time to process. Don't touch my anointed. Now let me show you the complete mechanics of the failed campaign, because understanding it is what allows you to read your whole story differently. The opponent's strategy against any chosen soul operates in stages. The first phase is the isolation, not necessarily physical, relational, the systematic erosion of connections that would provide external perspective. It doesn't happen dramatically. It happens through small frictions, misunderstandings that climb, stations where being close to people feels more difficult than they should. The goal of isolation is not loneliness itself, the goal is to remove the mirrors, to remove the people who could reflect back who you really are, when the inner narrative begins to tell you something different. "People like that believe things about themselves that connected people would immediately identify as lies." You went through stations of this isolation and you know what I am describing, because you felt it not as an attack, but as circumstances. Things just got hard with people, the energy was low, the connection seemed like effort and the silence went down. That wasn't bad luck, that was phase one. The second stage is redefinition. Once the mirrors are removed, the alternative narrative about who you are has room to sit down, not through dramatic accusation, but through the accumulated weight of small suggestions. You're great, you're not enough, what you thought was purpose is actually arrogance. What you thought was called is actually delusion. What seemed mission is actually just you wanting to feel special, kkkk 'eee family, I've heard so much about it' I know ") These thoughts do not announce their origin, they present themselves as self-knowledge, as clarity, as the reasonable conclusion of a person who is being realistic with himself. And they are calculated to produce a specific result, a person who stops. Stage three is replacement. Since isolation removed the mirrors and redefinition introduced a new story, the opponent offers an alternative, not always a dramatically wrong alternative. Sometimes something that looks like relief, which finally seems to make sense, a version of existence that doesn't carry the particular weight that comes with being what you really are. It seems to accommodate, it seems reasonable, it seems mature, and it is designed to be accepted at the time of maximum exhaustion. When everything you've been carrying has been made to look like a burden you've chosen unnecessarily. When the silence of heaven was interpreted as confirmation that the mission was never real. This is the moment the offer comes, and you didn't take it. I need you to understand what this means. Don't touch my anointed. There is a figure in the Hebrew tradition called Am Haaretz, an ordinary person of the earth, uncelebrated, not being in the courts of kings or speaking at meetings. Just present, just there, just doing the ordinary work of being alive in the specific place it occupies. And rabbinic tradition says something remarkable about these people. It says that the world is supported by them, not by the famous, not by the celebrated, not by those whose names are remembered, by those who simply appear, who simply continue, who simply live with integrity in the undetectable details of their undetectable days. You don't have to be famous for carrying something that matters. The Am Haaretz sustains the world through being who it is in the place it occupies. And the opposing army was not defeated by a dramatic counteroffensive, it was not defeated by 'superior force', nor by elaborate prayer, nor by the execution of a military strategy or specificity. You were defeated by your refusal to stop being who you are. That's what he hadn't seen before, not his performance, his nature. This phrase requires a moment of silence before we continue, because recognition takes time to settle on the layers on which it needs to sit. Let it land. Let your nervous system record what you've just been named. In the book of Revelation chapter 12, a war is described in heaven. Michael and his newly patented angels fight against the dragon and his angels. And the dragon is knocked down. And then verse 11 says something that reveals exactly how victory was won. And they overcame him by the blood of the lamb, and by the word of his testimony. Witness, the Greek word is martyrdom, not declaration, not prayer, not spiritual exercise. Evidence. The testimony that defeated the adversary was not pronounced words, it was reality demonstrated. The evidence lived, incarnated, not pronounced of a life that remained what it was, despite every force designed to turn it into something different, and that no one can deny, no one, no one can diminish. You don't have a testimony because you have declared yourself victorious. You have a testimony because you have a history of falls and indisputable lessons. People already talk about that you realize that resonance and its volume frequency. A real, documented history of seasons that were designed to produce a certain kind of person and evidence that they did not produce that person. This is his testimony, and the testimony, according to this text, is what overcomes the adversary. The army wasn't equipped for this. Each strategy in his manual was designed to produce a different target, for the person the pressure should have produced, for the hard version, the bitter version, the closed version, the person who eventually takes the offer and conforms. You didn't become that person, so the army has been fighting someone who doesn't exist without realizing that you've been trained exactly for this. And an army that fights the wrong target eventually runs out, remember the cinnamon training? Who disputes that with you today? Most are just defeat, today you understand this well, but at the beginning of the attacks, you didn't have the vision to architect, it wasn't the product of anything you did actively or consciously. It was the product you refused to be. Don't touch my anointed. And before I close this conversation, I need to leave you with three practical things. The first is that your most significant weapon from now on is not something you need to acquire, it's something you already have and often use with mastery. The nature that confused his strategy is not something you developed through discipline or spiritual effort. It was deposited in you before you knew it was there. You survived everything that was designed to remove it and will continue to function the same way that it always worked, not through your performance of it, but through your persistence in being who you really are. The second is that that exhaustion of the most difficult seasons was not spiritual weakness, it was the weight of someone who carried a target in which the opponent tried to keep with much effort until he asked to pull his tail between his paws, even try but are already scared with his look,

Your spirit is on fire. The degree of what has come against you is the measure of what you carry, and your focus only makes you sicker. Armies don't concentrate against things that aren't worth concentrating on. This is the third one. He can't build a new strategy in real time. It can adapt tactics, it can change approaches, but a fundamental intelligence failure cannot be corrected by adjusting the edges. It requires a full re-evaluation of the goals, and it does not have unlimited time for re-evaluation because you are training them directly is seeking this because your weapons are sharp. Which means that the specific window in which you are right now, the window immediately after the most focused campaign failure against you, is not the dangerous time you could assume it is. This is the moment of maximum strategic disorientation for what you've been working against you. Walk forward in what you've always been, not toward the battle, towards the place you've always been going, towards what's been prepared on the other side of what's just failed. The army didn't win, it could never have won, because it was fighting someone he didn't understand and now he's afraid of. 16 With 11 souls in glass pots, if I'm out of your tachy, call me in DM. I just got the ones that didn't reinforce the blood on the threshold. And I rescued them from the traitors, nor have I taken them yet. 17 Short that they call me Maluko ,) short even the time , for then comes the AULA . It's been happening less often today, it must be the sickle, I still can't hide it.

18 This is one of the most beautiful clips you've ever made. Other than the sound... Desert is a second home S2. 19 Feel this weight, of 7 strings and 3 humbucker bridge pickups. 20 TSLA34 10h exploded; 11:25 and 12:16 exploded again, 21 The first time I died, the light one, I was five, it was a Saturday night, around 10:00. My father, my mother and I were coming back from a church service, and on that day we were walking back, my father had sold the car the day before, on Friday, and by Monday we would be driving again, only that day, on that trip, four blocks from home, it was pretty close to 20 minutes on foot and we were less than 10 minutes from home. My parents crossed the street before and I went running right back to follow and I didn't see it; a brown fuse coming, the big one knows? Kkkk miscalculated, I figured. The fuse was supposed to be 30 miles an hour away. I remember very well the round headlights with the silver 'sobrow' coming very close, as the taillight is low, if I didn't go under the car, I was thrown into the windshield and in the sequence about 2 meters upwards spinning (words from my father, I remember everything spinning only) then I fell face down on the ground, I became aware, remember the beat, the turn, when I fell to the ground, I tried to come back quickly, about 3 seconds I looked at the fuse, which was already far away, now running. I looked for my mother to say it was fine, it was dirt road, I saw blood on her face, but it was the pebbles on her face nothing serious, but I couldn't get up, I saw my parents running my mother screaming and I said 'okay, it didn't happen, mom, you don't have to worry, but I couldn't get up, where the car picked up on the right leg, the hit was strong, we later confirmed that there was no fracture, only I was not able to walk for two weeks, I remember that I only improved because a friend of ours,) I remember that I was strange the theme of anointing oil in the church, the physical oil even to use in prayers, but in the following days I was already getting worried, so this friend anointed me, once, I remember her telling me that day: - Get ready for this is the first.) I remember after that, in about three days, I got better from 0 to 100, I walked again and for a couple of weeks I went down the street from home running because she worked in the school of the neighborhood where I grew up and then I finished primary; we went down the street every day to find her going up the street, thanking and showing that it was for what she did, I will always keep it, and she knows I always remember that I saw her, that it was because of her that I got away.) 22 The guys had so much prob c analog pedal that they didn't even call, support in the middle of the sound, sometimes come back before the end of the song. 23 You mean that character, Tyler Durden, from the epic ninety-nine movie? He was based on me. Only it's not just two personalities; it's four. The sacrificial, the one who sees everything, the one who opens you in the middle and the one who takes your soul. 24 Standards of sustained effort without proportional return that each behavioral model says eventually train a person in strategic withdrawal from genuine investment. You kept investing anyway. They found isolation stations so complete that standard models said their self-conception should have deteriorated. The inner sense of who you are requires external mirroring to remain stable. 'Remove the mirrors long enough and the image distorts'. Your self-conception had not distorted. Something was doing the mirroring that did not require external sources. They're back.

More. They searched for the original wound. Every profile has one. The foundational experience of damage that shapes each subsequent response pattern. The original wound is where the bottom eventually lives. They found the wound. They applied the model. They predicted the fracture point. They were wrong. Not because the wound wasn't real. That's exactly what they thought. But what she produced in you wasn't what she produced in every other profile examined. In standard profiles, a wound produces protection. A layer of behavior designed to ensure that it is never replicated. The function is always the same. Reduce genuine exposure to prevent repeated damage. What your wound produced was almost the direct opposite. A particular kind of attention to others carrying something similar. A sensitivity that was not performed was not strategic. Not even fully conscious. A quality of perceiving the weight in people most observers pass without registering. The wound had not produced armor. I had produced antennas. The guy who lives under sleep. That you've been present for so long that you can't clearly remember a version of yourself that didn't carry it. It comes from delivering value in environments that do not return proportionally. To be the person people call in crisis and the person nobody thinks to call when you're in crisis. Carrying weight that gets invisible because you never put it down long enough for someone to see it. Galatians 6, verse 2 says, carry each other's burdens. Three verses later, each bear his own burden. The Greek uses two completely different words. Baros, weight so heavy it's overwhelming. Fortune, standard backpack, ordinary weight of the day. You've been carrying baros that didn't belong to you. Not by mistake, because something fundamental about how you're built makes you capable of it. Because you were built with a load capacity that exceeds what is ordinary. The exaltation you feel is not evidence that something is wrong with you. It's evidence of what you've done.

Don't touch my anointed. Back to the file. After the team concluded that the standard frameworks were insufficient to locate a breakpoint, they climbed to the program director. He went over everything. Then he asked a question that surprised everyone in the room. Not where the analysis failed. Not what variable was lost. He asked, what's supporting this? No one in the room had an answer. Because the answer is not in any intelligence database. It is in Isaiah chapter 40, sitting in a book for 25 centuries, describing exactly what they were looking at. But those who wait for the Lord will renew their strength. They will climb with wings like eagles, run and not tire. The Hebrew word translated as "waiting" there is kavar, does not mean optimism, does not mean positive expectation, kavar means tying together, be structurally intertwined with something external to you in such a way that when your own strength is exhausted, you pull from what you are bound there. They were looking for the bottom of their structure. They couldn't find it because its structure isn't self-contained. She's tied to something that has no bottom. This is not a spiritual metaphor, it is the literal description of the charge support architecture of what they were examining. Don't touch my anointed. This is the climax of everything this transmission has built. After receiving the findings, the director requested his complete history, each documented experience, each loss, each period of sustained difficulty. Not for further analysis. He wanted to understand what had been survived. And while he was reading through it, something happened that he later described to the language team that she didn't expect. He said that he had spent his career believing that the defining question about anyone was how much he could handle, how much pressure before the essential structure gave in. He said reading his history had made him realize that he was asking the wrong question his entire career. The right question is not how much a person gets bear. The right question is what happens to the essential thing inside her while she's supporting it. Because in every profile he had already examined, even the most resilient, the essential thing changed, adapted, contracted or hardened or restructured around the damage. The person on the other side was always measurably different from the person who entered. Reading his history, station by station, loss by loss, he could not find where the essential thing had changed. The same essential orientation present at the beginning of the record was present at the end. The same quality of care, the same specific kind of hope. The same refusal to let what had been done to you determine what you would do with it. And then he wrote his evaluation. Subject profile represents a category of human architecture that the standard models of this program are not equipped to evaluate. The foundational structure of load support does not seem to respond to the variables that the methodology is built to attack. That's not resilience. Resilience is a property of structures that bend and return. What is present here does not bend, because the load support foundation is not located in the variables that the pressure reaches. Recommendation? Close the evaluation. This profile is beyond the scope of what this program is equipped to evaluate. Classification? Impossible. I need you to understand what this classification really means. Impossible doesn't mean perfect, it doesn't mean no fracture or no wound. Impossible means outside the category of what the standard system can account for. You have fractures, wounds that are not fully healed, areas where what was done to you is still present in how you respond. None of this moves you out of classification, because the classification is not about your condition, it's about your foundation. And these are two entirely different things. Second Corinthians chapter 4. In everything we are troubled, but not crushed. Perplexed, but not discouraged. Chased, but not helpless. slaughtered, but not destroyed. This is not a description of someone without damage, it is a description of someone whose damage does not reach the load support structure. The damage is real, the foundation holds up anyway. You were not in more difficult circumstances because you were less favored, you were in more difficult circumstances because what you were carrying only reveals under the kind of pressure that ordinary conditions do not produce. There's one final thing in the file. The analyst submitted an additional annotation after the rating was registered. She said she had spent her career believing that the most important thing about anyone was what she could resist. And that working on her file had made her realize that she had never asked a different question. Not what this person can resist, what this person is carrying. And she answered her own question. Something that works as a connection, a structural bond to something external to the subject that supplies what the subject's own reserves cannot supply. When the subject's measurable internal resources are exhausted, something continues to work that does not pull from these resources. The profile is sustained from outside of itself. Then she added a final line. Whatever this person is connected to, it's worth being connected to. Don't touch my anointed. I asked you at first to hold on to the feeling of invisibility. The room full of people who didn't see you. I want you to understand what was really going on in that room. The people around you weren't seeing you. This part was exact, but invisibility is a property of the observer, not the observed. The thing that cannot be seen is not the thing without presence. It's the thing the observer doesn't have eyes for. You were being studied more accurately and more thoroughly than any human observer ever brought to the examination, and the conclusion reached was not filed under ordinary. For those who feel the weight that this transmission arrives, that weight that recognition produces in the body and has been completely identified. 25 Still in the line of characters, some of them, two of the good ones is the Jotaro Jojo of Bizarre Adventure, and the Morpheus of the HQ, Netflix the first one was good, the second ñ should have done, sand man. 26 SHOCK PARK to glue there at 09:00, decepáumashead, warn Zoio to glue it to the track with a stop of it I need to return. 27 The real thing is that everybody's water is very low, kkkk sleeps, works, crap and starts everything new kkkkk all right, but want to teach me that? The basic? The basic you don't even care, you act like fuck, aim at what's up, what you haven't got yet, and show the way. Or if you're already there, show us how you got here. I don't like the basics very much, it doesn't deserve our attention, if not, it will always have what to adjust and what is far away is there. I want what's on top. It's not my focus here, it's simple already done. What they're trying to sell us as MATURITY, it's just an oral brake + anthill. The lyrics are the part of channeled psychology, it's like watching a movie; you stop watching it because some dialogue goes against your values? If so, he's got identity issues. The resonance, rhythm and frequency is unique and measurable. You can only feel the power; you can't even judge it, and doing so by its effect on you, that's exactly where it generates the indicators.

The one who doesn't understand that the access has ended completely. What you couldn't hold onto is returning to whoever threw it. And it's not about revenge, or wishing anyone harm, or sitting around waiting for someone to pay for what they did. This is about spiritual balance. We are never happy to execute a soul or reputation. But when people try to sow confusion in your life, manipulate your image, touch your wounds, activate your anxiety or provoke a reaction to then use it against you, that energy doesn't just disappear because you decide not to respond. Energy is looking for a place to settle down. And if you don't receive it, if you don't feed it, if you don't open the door to it in fear, anger or despair, then it starts to return to its point of origin. 31 Man, as God is perfect, that everybody always knew, but who knew, kkkk q He would pass the wheel in the fashion, kkkkk the inflamed staff of the pulpits and doors of the temples that judged all the mulekada maloka all their lives. The wizard of a little tease, and makes the sisters disappear from the face of the earth, even from social networks. sickle magic. 35 Let me show you some of the scriptures before I take you to the anatomy of what you did. Daniel chapter 3. Nebuchadnezzar, the most powerful king of the earth at that time, built a golden statue, twenty - five meters high, three and a half meters wide, and decreed that all the soul under his dominion would bow down before that statue when the sound of the instruments touched. The strategy was elegant, not just about worship, it was about predictability. It was about building a reality in which every soul under his domain responded exactly as he expected it to respond, the moment he hoped, to the way he had decreed. The system worked, whole crowds fell down, and three souls did not fall down. Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego. When they were brought before the king, and the king offered them a second chance, because he understood that no one in good conscience would hold the refusal before the promised consequence, they

They answered something that completely changed what was coming. Daniel 3, verse 17 and 18. Our God, whom we serve, is able to deliver us from the furnace of burning fire, and he will deliver us out of your hands, O king. And if not, know, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up. Hold it right there. The first part of the answer was expected. Faith in liberation, trust in the power of God. That the king had seen before. It had a calculation built around it. It was the second part that completely destroyed the calculation. And if not? What if we don't? Even if he doesn't free us. That particular phrase was not in Nebuchadnezzar's script. It wasn't in anyone's script. Because the entire pressure structure worked on the assumption that people's faith was conditional. That if God did not intervene at the exact moment they waited, they would bend their knees. Those three said the exact opposite. They said: our attitude is not conditioned to the result, even if God chooses not to rid us, even if the furnace consumes us, our decision is already made before we know the outcome. That phrase made Nebuchadnezzar lose control. The text says that the king was filled with rage in such a way that the appearance of his face changed. He ordered the furnace to be heated seven times more than usual. The strongest men in the army were called to tie them up. Look what's happening here, the most powerful king on earth has just lost his composure. The predictability he controlled was broken by three people who made a decision outside his script: Don't touch my anointed. Now I need you to understand something about your own life with this as context. The opponent is not omniscient, he has no direct access to his interior. It operates by probability, by patterns, by accumulated observation of what you did in the past, of what people like you did, than psychological calculation applied to your specific history would indicate as the most likely answer in a given situation. And he builds whole strategies based on these projections. When he puts pressure on a soul, he has already calculated what decision that soul will make. The consequences of this decision are already in place. The resources that will move in response to this decision are already allocated. Everything operates on the assumption that the forecast is correct. Notice what just happened to your chest when those words were uttered. The slight expansion, the settlement of something that was strained against a truth that you didn't know you were hoping to hear named. Your nervous system knew what was being said before your mind had time to process. The weight and commitment of the pressure pushed you to a specific response. Every part of your story screamed for you to answer in a way. Every family emotional pattern you carry was calibrated for that family and cowardly response to a large extent. Each logical calculation applied to the situation pointed to the same conclusion. And you did the opposite, not a modified version of the expected answer, the opposite, do not touch my anointed. And here's what the opponent discovered at that moment. The intelligence that had been positioned to predict you failed, failed not partially. You failed completely. The decision he had modeled as 99% likely did not happen, and the decision he had modeled as 1% possible happened entirely. When this happens in the invisible plane, it's not just a miscalculation. It's an operational collapse. Because the entire chain of events that was positioned to unfold from your intended decision, the allocated resources, the coordinated forces, the doors that were closed in anticipation of your response, the opportunities that were blocked, because the calculation was that you wouldn't be ready for them if you decided otherwise. This whole chain needs to be repositioned from zero. And repositioning is not instantaneous. There is a window between the moment when the unpredictable decision is made and the moment when the opposition succeeds Recalibrate your strength. That window is open in your life now. Now let me tell you about God's side of that same decision, because the purpose of this conversation isn't just about the devil losing control, it's about God being amazed on the other side. There is an important operational difference between God being surprised and God being amazed. God is never surprised, because He sees the end from the beginning, but He can be amazed. Pasmó is different from surprised. Pasmó is the reaction of those who recognize something they knew was possible, but who rarely see it manifested at the time that something carries the maximum weight of consequence. When you made that last decision, God wasn't caught off guard. He knew it was possible. That's exactly what he had you trained for. But God also knows the probability. He knows how many souls, under the same pressure, choose the predictable path. He knows how rare it is for a soul to maintain the integrity of the original decision when each surrounding pressure is calibrated to corrupt that decision. And when you made the decision out of the script, God reacted the same way. The way he reacted to Job when the adversary challenged him. He pointed. He drew attention. He said, in the heavenly record where these things are documented, something equivalent to. Look at this one. Look what that soul just did. Look at the decision she just made when every calculation predicted the opposite. Look what was sealed on it that pressure just revealed. The double reaction, the devil losing control on one side, God being amazed on the other, is what defines the specific kind of event that has happened in his life recently. Don't touch my anointed. Now let me tell you what this means operationally. The window is open, the opposition forces are in recalibration, the chains that were positioned to unfold from their planned decision are collapsing. And what was blocked in anticipation of your expected response is being unlocked in reverse order. You will.

notice small changes first. Things that seemed permanently still start to move. People who didn't respond begin to answer. Doors that seemed permanently closed start to open. Not all at once, in sequence, in the order that makes sense because it needs to be prepared in every area of your life. Don't take these changes as a coincidence. They are the direct operational consequence of the window that your decision opened. And don't stop the attitude that opened the window. The continuity of the original decision, the maintenance of that same inner posture that produced the first inflection, support, is what keeps the window open while the repositioning unfolds. You don't have to understand everything now. You just need to stay who you were right now. Even if the rest of the world hasn't achieved what happened there yet. The opposition will recalibrate. Eventually, but until then, you are walking within a specific phase that your own decision has produced. A phase where the predictability that imprisoned you ceased to work. And where what was reserved for you on the other side of it is being positioned to arrive. Your protocols are more active than ever, sharp perception and now the reason you've asked so much.) 36 Judgment is now, now, salvation is by grace so it does not need judgment, judgment is by position in the Kingdom, and in reality it has already happened. Gallard. 37 If Joseph had not spoken with his teeth, if he had counted in childhood and had given everything freely to his brothers, he would have come to the position that arrived, much more suss and quite possible than in less time. The plan already existed, the brothers were not cooperative or part of the plan, they were self-accusators and used in contingency.

38 The media will take a while to release this, but Ukraine is already winning the war against Russia, almost dominating its own territory previously taken. Now for the last few days. Russia has already exhausted the 'convicted soldiers' and are now beginning to call the reservists, this is another info that little people know: all Russian artillery since the beginning of the war in 2022 was constituted by prisoners sentenced to the death penalty or more than 40 years of detention under custody of freedom. It was the Russian battalions that advanced most in Ukrainian territory at the beginning of the war, which is why the US had not yet entered with the technology of the kamikaze drones: Puma, Raven, Sentinel, Predator, and now the Low-cost Unmanned Combat Attack System, you can make a drone like that at $3000. Answer honestly, with satellite connection technology that the U.S. has today 'Starlink', for an F22 'medium hunt of greatest technology on the planet belonging to the U.S., would you really need someone inside it to fly? Even with all the cargo and ammunition occupied; today, to the owners of technology. War is homeoffice. 39 Of course, 'it' that saved you was not a coincidence, but something that had been written inside you long before you knew it was there! The book of Daniel, chapter 3, describes exactly this phenomenon, although most readers pass over the technical accuracy of the text. Three boys were thrown into a heated furnace seven times more than normal temperature. The text is precise in this. Seven times. The flames were so intense that the soldiers who threw them inside died with the heat at the very entrance of the furnace. The whole parameter of physical existence predicted incineration even before the bodies reached the chamber floor. And then the king looked into the furnace and saw something that the parameters did not foresee. The text says, there were three

The men we cast into the fire? I have not seen them bound, but now I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and there is no harm in them. And the fourth looks like the Son of the gods. Read it carefully. Four, not three. The king's account was right. Three were thrown, but four were walking. The room hadn't been thrown. The room appeared inside the furnace at the exact moment when the parameters predicted the end. That's the mechanism. That's what was written on your record. When the test reached the point where the standard parameters predicted its end, something appeared that the standard parameters did not include. And this appearance is what allowed its continuation. You didn't survive because you were stronger than what came against you. You survived because something walked with you through what you went through. And that something was equipped to deal with what your standard parameters weren't. The classification the sky assigned to your case, skin, refers exactly to this. The category of soul whose survival required the activation of a layer that exceeds the standard parameters. You are now permanently in this category, and here's what this means from now on. When a soul was classified as skin, this classification carries operational consequences for the whole situation that follows. Future evidence is no longer processed exclusively by the parameters of the original record. The skin layer was activated, and once activated, it does not deactivate. That is why some souls go through further evidence with a strange serenity that others find incomprehensible. Not because they somehow became less affected by what comes against them, but because they are operating under different parameters now. Skin classification means that what would end other souls operates in a different way when they find these. The same situations produce different results because the structure that processes these situations has been permanently changed. You've noticed that in yourself, even if you had no language for it. There are situations that visibly destroy other people, and that you went through with a stillness that you cannot fully explain. There are losses that have ended other lives and that you absorbed and continued. There are weights that should have crushed you and that you somehow kept carrying without breaking. That's not your strength, that's the operational result of the classification. The skin layer is processing what comes to you. It is not visible to you, because it operates under your perception, but it is the reason you keep going through what others do not. Let me show you something else, the deepest layer of it. Psalm 91 describes the operational reality of souls skin in a language that most readers experience as poetry. But which, in the technical vocabulary of archiving the spiritual world, is descriptively precise: a thousand will fall at your side and ten thousand at your right hand, but will not come to you. Read it carefully. A thousand will fall, ten thousand. The numbers are not symbolic, they describe the standard distribution of results when situations of a certain category arrive. In normal parameters, the result is what the verse describes. People fall, the number of fallen is great, the situations are real and the victims are real. But the verse continues: it will not come to you. No, you will be saved at the last moment of what has reached you. No, you'll recover from what hit you. The text says: it will not come. That thing that knocked out ten grand around you won't even catch up to you. There is a perimeter that operates around your skin soul. The parameters that produce mass victims around the soul do not extend to the soul itself. That's what happened in your case. What led everyone around you, visible victims, invisible victims, victims of categories you may never know, did not reach you. He came close, surrounded the entire field, but had a perimeter operating around his soul that the situation failed penetrate. And this perimeter is permanent. This is the second mechanism of classification. The skin-soul isn't just the one that survived once. The skin soul is the one whose perimeter is now in continuous operation. Future situations of similar category will find the same perimeter. The events that brought down the others will still not come. Their survival is not the conclusion of a story, it is the inauguration of an operational reality. Now I want to take you to something that hardly anyone understands about souls. The skin souls, because the implications change the way you read everything that has ever happened to you and everything that will still happen. The skin souls are equipped for a specific reason. The equipment is not random. This reason has a name in Hebrew tradition. The name is Limud. Limud refers to someone who has learned through direct experience, not through instruction, not through observation, through the body, through the soul, through the actual passage through the situation. Limud is the one who has the kind of knowledge that can only be transmitted to others by someone who stepped on the same floor. The skin souls are equipped because they will be Limud souls. They will carry the kind of knowledge that cannot be obtained by any other means. And this knowledge will be required by other souls who, in their time, will face similar situations and will need to be guided by someone who can tell them, with the authority of those who have been there, that the situation does not have the final word. That's why you survived. Not as a reward, not as a preference, as preparation. You were equipped to be Limud to souls who will reach the threshold of what you went through and who will need your knowledge to make the passage themselves. You've already begun to notice them. They appear in your life with a strange specificity. People you don't even know well saying things to you that indicate they're approaching the kind of edge you've already crossed. Talks that get serious all of a sudden at times that you

I didn't expect it. The feeling that someone is asking you something with the presence, something he can't put into words. These are the souls you've been equipped for. You don't have to look for them. They're coming. The skin classification in your record is operating in the spiritual world as a kind of beacon, flag, sign. That other souls who approach similar situations can perceive without consciously recognizing what they are realizing. They see your experience in you, because something in their structure is looking for the limud they need, and your record matches the search. Pay attention to who keeps appearing in your life. Pay attention to the texture of the questions that these people ask. Pay attention to what you catch yourself saying to them, because the words that come out of you in those moments, are not built by your conscious mind, they are emerging from the limud layer that was activated when you rose. And those words carry a weight that your normal speech does not carry. This is the operational dimension of classification. There's one more thing I need to reveal, because without it, the image is incomplete. The skin classification, once assigned, is not erased by failure. It's crucial that you understand. Many souls who carry this classification, spend years later terrified that they will somehow lose it, that a single mistake, a single fall, a single relapse, in a behavior they thought they had overcome, will cause heaven to revoke what was granted. The structure doesn't work that way. The classification was attributed because of what happened in the test. The evidence was real. The discrepancy between the expected result and the actual result is permanent. The activated skin layer cannot be disabled by a later failure, because a later failure does not undo the original event. You're skin. You'll still be skin. Every drop you experience from now on is processed by parameters that include skin classification. Even your failures now

They're being sued in a different way from the failures of other souls, and everyone knows that. 40 The text says that the Father blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places and chose us in him before the foundation of the world. Read those phrases carefully. Blessings are described as already existing in heavenly places, in the past, sealed, operating. The choice is described as having happened before the foundation of the world, before the visible reality is structured, before time, the way you experience, start running. You were chosen before the world was founded. The Greek word translated as chosen is eklego, and it carries a technical precision that most translations softens. Eklego does not mean preferred between options, it means selected from an authority position for a designated function that no other instrument could fulfill. Being eklego is to have been identified, named and designated even before the visible architecture exists to receive you. His eklego designation is sealed in a layer that the visible world cannot access, but his body remembers. That's why you always felt different. The body that walks through common existence is carrying the residue of an authorship that happened up there, and this residue produces a constant and low feeling that something in its current position does not match its original configuration. This feeling is not disease, this feeling is information. It's the way the body has to record the mismatch between what you were written to be and the environment where you were placed. Most souls do not feel this mismatch, because most were not eklego of the layer from where you went. They fit because they were configured to fit in. You don't fit because you weren't set up to fit in. You've been set up for something else, somewhere that doesn't work with the rules that this place works. The Hebrew word that captures this reality is Bechor, almost always translated as firstborn, but translation loses its real meaning. Bechor does not refer to the birth order in the visible world, it refers to a category of designation in which a soul carries inheritance rights that comes before the distribution of resources of the visible world. Being Bechor is to have been placed on the top layer, with claims that the bottom layer will have to honor sooner or later, even when the bottom layer, at first, does not even recognize these claims. The book of Exodus chapter 4, verse 22, records a statement that names this designation directly. The text says, Israel is my son, my firstborn. The Hebrew word used is Bechor. The statement is not about birth order, it's about structural designation. Israel, in that text, is being identified as carrying claims that come before the distribution of the world, claims with which the world will have to align sooner or later, even when this alignment requires facing established structures. The Bechor designation has been operating on your record from the beginning. You feel this transmission resonating in places that have been silent, which contains the practical activation of the effect of this statement on you, and if that chronic feeling that the resources, recognitions and positions that should have been yours were delayed or ended up in the wrong place, were not a failure of your perception, but the exact record of Bechor claims that have not yet been processed by the slow alignment of the visible world. With the top structure, I want to take you to a place your spirit was hoping to be taken. There is a story in the book of 1 Samuel explains the pattern you've been living on, without recognizing it was a pattern. The prophet Samuel was sent to anoint a new king. He went to the house of a man named Jesse. Jesse had eight children. Samuel asked him to introduce his children. Jesse introduced the older seven. Each had the Right look. Each carried the visible marks of what a king was supposed to look like back then. Each one was the kind of son a father would present when a prophet came looking for royalty. Samuel looked at each of them and one by one the answer came. Not this one, not this one, not this one. After the seventh was refused, Samuel asked Jesse a question containing the entire pattern. Are these all your kids? Jesse hesitated and then admitted he had one more, the youngest. Which he didn't even bring into the room because he hadn't even considered the possibility that the youngest was the answer. What had been left in the field caring for the sheep, because his role in the family was to carry out the work that no one else wanted to do. That was David. That was the king. The text records that when David was brought from the field, Samuel was instructed by heaven to anoint him immediately. The text says, this is it. The seven who looked the right way were not. What had been ignored, underestimated and given as the wrong category was exactly the one the sky had been preparing all along. This pattern is the pattern of its existence. You've been underestimated by people who didn't have the capacity to recognize what you carry. You were ignored in rooms where they were scanning the visible marks. And the visible marks on your case didn't match the pattern of the time for what royalty should look like. You were left in the field, sometimes literally, sometimes symbolically, doing the work no one else wanted to do. While inside, the room decided who was important. The room was wrong. The room goes wrong again and again with souls whose authorship took place in the layer where yours happened. Because the room is calibrated for visible marks and the marks you carry are not visible to the calibration that the room uses. The prophet had to ask the question why the prophet was operating with information that the family did not have. The family presented on the basis of appearance, the prophet selected based on something else. The sky has been operating on you with information that the rooms where you

They didn't. The rooms presented their seven children. The rooms were informed, one by one, that the seven children were not the answer. The rooms have not yet been forced to bring the eighth, because they were allowed to operate under their error during the time that the upper structure required. But that time is running out and the moment is coming when the question will be asked: Is that all of them? And someone will have to admit that there's one more, the one they left in the field, the one they didn't consider. That's you. I need to describe something about the way you moved through common existence, which you may not have understood until now. Did you notice it doesn't fit into hierarchies? Did you notice that the common stairs that other people climb seem wrong when you try to climb? Have you noticed that the positions that other souls accept as desirable seem cages to you, even when accepting them would solve all the visible problems of your life? Have you wondered if you have anything defective about your ambition or your ability to accommodate yourself? There's nothing wrong with you. The hierarchies of common existence were structured to organize souls, whose authorship took place in the standard layer. These souls fit into hierarchies because hierarchies were designed for them. You don't fit because the hierarchies weren't designed for you. You were designed for a structure that operates with different parameters. And your body knows the difference even when your mind couldn't put it into words. The designation of royalty that has been operating on your record does not require human appointment to be valid. She comes before the human nomination. It exists in a layer above human structures. And human structures, sooner or later, are forced to align with it. Even when this alignment takes time that the visible world considers irrational. The book of Psalms, chapter 8, verses 4 to 6, contains a description that names this layer of designation. The text

Says he's the man, so you can remember him. Thou hast made it little less than the angels, and thou hast crowned it with glory and honour. You gave him dominion over the works of your hands. Read the text carefully. The coronation is described as having already happened. The domain is described as already granted. The verbs are in the past. The appointment of royalty is not a future promise. It's a structural reality that's already been sealed in the top layer. And the slow recognition of the visible world does not change the fact that the designation is already operating. You were crowned in a layer that the visible world cannot see. The crown does not disappear because the visible world does not recognize it. The crown disappears from the reports of the visible world because the visible world is reporting a layer that does not contain the crown. The crown is in the top layer. 41 Access, influence, scope and responsibility. This whole structure is not born of chance, it is born of convergence between what you have endured in secret and what time has finally decided to reveal. It's not because you're overreacting, it's because something in you recognizes the language of destiny itself. You're not in luck, you're in line. And alignment has this mysterious way of appearing after the soul has bled out enough to learn to discern what is true. There was a time when you might have looked into your hands and thought they carried more fatigue than the future. There were days when the mind tried to reduce its greatness to the size of its exhaustion, and yet you continued. Not always with the usual cinematic courage, perhaps not with perfect speeches, but with that safe and quiet fidelity, who does not give up because something inside still pulses, still calls, still believes. This secret fidelity is more powerful than the whole human world imagines, because the world values brightness, but the invisible is the one that sustains brightness when it arrives. What most people didn't see was what you needed to do to Keep existing on the inside while everything seemed unstable on the outside. You had to learn to cross your own anxiety without surrendering to it, to live with delays without losing direction, to endure unanswered questions without allowing your heart to rot in revolt. It forged a rare structure on you. And rare structures are not born in comfortable places. They are born in pressures that compress until the essentials appear. In terms of the soul, you were cut by waiting. In terms of the body, his system learned to stand, even when the weight seemed to exceed the limit. In terms of lineage, you are the person who has come to interrupt cycles of surrender, fear and submission that have passed through entire generations. So when this new offer comes, she won't find anyone empty, she'll find someone seasoned. You're gonna find someone who went through the forge and you're still standing. That changes everything. Because what comes now asks for more than desire, asks for maturity. There's a reason certain doors only open after a long season of silence. It's not because the universe forgot about you, it's because there was something in your background that needed to mature in the dark, without the distraction of the audience. And that's the point many people don't understand. The invisible process is often the most decisive of all. What's coming isn't small, it's not common, it's not casual. He arrives like those winds that announce change before even the human eye can see the sky changing. She doesn't just test her ability to receive, she tests her identity. Test if you still see yourself as someone who needs to ask permission to take up space, or if you finally understand that space has been prepared for you. There are people who come to the blessing with the spirit of scarcity, still acting as if they need to shrink to deserve it. But you were separated to learn another language, that of firm presence, lucid gratitude, serene recognition that growing up is not betrayal of your past, but proof that the past was not in vain. access, influence, reach and responsibility. And the most impressive thing is that it is not born of chance, it is born of convergence between what you have endured in secret and what time has finally decided to reveal. If this is touching your soul, know: it is not because you are overreacting, it is because something in you recognizes the language of destiny itself. You're not in luck, you're in line. You were separated to learn another language, that of firm presence, lucid gratitude, serene recognition that growing up is not betrayal of your past, but proof that the past was not in vain. Do you really want this, or do you just like the idea of being seen? Because being seen for real is being called to answer for more, to take care of more, to incarnate more. And you're right on that threshold. Maybe that's why your inside is in sensitive analysis, maybe that's why you need to align yourself, organize your mind, clear noises, not accept anything. Something about you knows that the new can't be treated with the old mentality. And that inner knowledge is sacred. There is a huge difference between being praised and being recognized, and you begin to enter a stage where recognition ceases to be generic and becomes real weight. 42 The real thing is, I'd rather be wrong than right. Because when I'm wrong, the adjustment depends on me. And when I'm right, someone is wrong, (

To transform the negative is to regain your own strength.

1 Most people, at best, can be a frequency domain redirector. The transmutator is the category considered unique, it can transform a negative frequency into a highly positive frequency. That leaves the devil headmaster, represents what he lost, and can never recover. His permanent limitation, proof that what he sacrificed, is worth much more than what he earned through his own decision. 2 Yes, it has felt especially as a metaphor. When someone says "Telephony Building on April Seven, green carpet, last generation COBOL," they're usually not describing just one physical place. It's evoking an entire culture: Technology considered modern in a time and that continues to sustain operations decades later. Ancient systems that still carry enormous value. Corporate environments full of history, accumulated knowledge and also some resistance to change. The feeling that the new one is built on very old layers that keep working behind the scenes. In the world of technology, this happens all the time. Many people imagine that everything has been replaced by modern languages and cloud, but much of the financial system, telecommunications and government still depends on software written in COBOL or running in mainframes. So if your phrase had an almost symbolic or ironic tone, it makes sense. It's like saying: "Behind the modern façade, there is still an ancient structure supporting everything." Since you work with corporate systems and SAP, you have probably seen versions of this same reality: technologies new interface and processes of decades ago in the core of business. The "holy" part is also a common joke among IT professionals to describe systems so old that no one knows exactly who created them, but everyone is afraid to turn them off. 3 See, hell operates through fear. This is their main tool, the only most effective weapon. The whole dark system depends on making you believe you can't, that it's not worth it, that it's better to give up, that the pain of continuing is worse than the pain of abandoning. But when a soul appears that looks directly at fear, that recognizes it as terrifying and chooses to act anyway, the whole system goes on maximum alert, because if a person can do that, it means that fear has lost its power over it. And if fear doesn't work, hell will run out of its main weapon. You've become a mathematical problem that the darkness cannot solve. What I'm about to tell you now may sound like an elaborate fantasy, but you know, in the deepest of your being, that's true, because it explains too much that you've been experiencing lately and that you couldn't interpret. After you activated this alert with your impossible act of insanity, something unprecedented happened in the infernal hierarchies. An emergency meeting was called, not by some global crisis, not by some massive dark operation, but specifically to discuss you. Because what you did broke a statistical pattern that darkness has been using for thousands of years to predict how humans respond to fear. You became an anomaly that needed to be analyzed, understood and neutralized. The commanders of these hierarchies were called to examine their spiritual profile, to understand how it was possible that a "common" human being, without special training, without professional psychological preparation, without the resources that others have, could demonstrate a type of courage who rivals angelic warriors. And the report they presented left the dark principalities themselves in absolute silence, because they discovered something they did not expect to find. You don't act out of blind courage. It is neither recklessness nor lack of awareness of danger. You calculate the risks, you understand perfectly what can go wrong, you feel fear completely without blocking it, without denying it, without running from it, and you choose to act for integrity anyway. This is what terrifies the darkness: not the absence of fear, but the ability to function in full power while fear is present. The despair specialist observed: "This soul processes fear better than our own entities. It does not block it, does not deny it, feels it completely and continues to work." The chaos master added: "We have tried multiple scenarios of the worst possible case. In all of them, this person chose the most difficult but correct path." He who controls through greed murmured: "We offer easy shortcuts several times. She rejected everyone without hesitation. He prefers to suffer by doing what is right to prosper by doing what is wrong." But the most devastating analysis came from the leader himself. He looked at the entire file of his life, saw every moment of courage that you demonstrated without witnesses, every difficult decision that you made when no one would know if you chose the easy way, every time you stood up when you had every justification in the world to remain fallen, and said something you had never said about a living human being: "This soul has a fiber that I respect." Respect? Darkness doesn't respect easily. No wonder without a devastating reason. They don't recognize it without overwhelming evidence. But they recognized something about you that forced them to completely change their strategy on how to deal with you. Now comes the part that'll creep your skin out. Because after analyzing his courage for weeks, after trying to find weaknesses that they could exploit, after searching for cracks in his spiritual armor, the principal Prince Asmodeo this hierarchical cat made a decision that had not made in time immemorial. He decided to make you an offer. And before you think you've never received an offer, let me explain how this works. The dark forces do not appear with written contracts. They don't come asking for your signature. They do not present themselves with horns and tails offering riches in exchange for their soul. That's cartoon. They test through real life situations. Do you remember those constant opportunities often appearing in the last few months? The one who seemed safe, and was supposed to solve several of your problems at once? They insisted a lot, made it easy, made it clear it was all yours if you wanted. But there was a little detail, a little concession you would have to make: compromise your principles just a little bit. Nothing serious. Nothing that would harm anyone directly. But you knew, deep down, that wasn't right. And you said no. Maybe not in a dramatic way. Maybe you just felt that inner discomfort and decided not to. That inner voice that said, "This is not right", even if it seems advantageous. That was the test. Or do you remember that moment when you could have avenged yourself? I had the perfect opportunity. The person who hurt him was vulnerable. Nobody would know if you took advantage of the situation. Considering everything, you chose to let it go. Not for weakness. Not out of fear of the consequences. But because something inside you can't operate for revenge, even when it seems justified. This was also a test. The darkness was offering you a deal. A deal they only offer to souls they consider worthy of respect. They were saying: "You have the courage we need. Work with us and make sure you never have to be brave alone again. We'll give you power, resources and protection. You just need to stop worrying so much about doing what is right and focus on doing what works." It's a tempting proposition. Especially when You're tired of fighting alone. When it seems that no one recognizes some efforts. When doing what's right only brought you difficulties. But you refused. Maybe not consciously. Perhaps he simply felt that deep discomfort and decided not to go that way. That inner compass that points north even when the hardest path is the one chosen. And when you refused, when you chose to remain brave in the right way instead of accepting the easy way in the wrong way, the darkness understood something that led them to make an even more impacting decision. They understand that they will never be able to corrupt it. No matter what they offer. It doesn't matter how much pressure they push. No matter how tempting they make the proposal. Your fiber is incorruptible. A decision has been made that will completely transform your life. It wasn't decided to just protect him. It was decided to promote him. There is a heavenly protocol called "confirmed warrior," which is only activated when a human soul demonstrates such consistent courage that it no longer needs to be tested. When it becomes clear that nothing will break it, nothing will corrupt it, nothing will cause that person to abandon the right path. You've just been officially classified in that category. This means that from now on, the heavenly hierarchies have instructions to ensure that you never face a battle without the necessary resources to win. That you will NEVER be put in a situation where you have to choose between survival and principles. May you never have to be brave all alone again. Because you've been brave alone long enough. 4 So he ordered all the hierarchies of hell to keep their distance. No interference, no temptation, no attack, just silent observation. You've become so fascinating to the devil that he'd rather study you than destroy you. But here it is.

What the devil didn't calculate: God was watching their whole meeting. While the devil saw in you a scientific puzzle to be deciphered, God saw something completely different: the confirmation of an experiment of Him, which He began long ago. Let me reveal to you something about your existence that you never knew: you were not born by accident. Its specific combination of features was designed intentionally before the earth was Earth. You are a divine prototype of something God has been developing for ages. Do you know what the greatest spiritual challenge is? It's not good when life is good. Anyone can do that. The real challenge is to maintain a genuine light after experiencing genuine darkness; to maintain the ability to love after experiencing real hatred; to maintain faith after having every reason to give up. Most souls can't. Or he never experiences true darkness and therefore possesses a naive light; or he experiences darkness and is permanently altered by it. But God theorized that it was possible to create a soul, which would develop specific characteristics and combinations for these same characteristics, able to cross the complete darkness and emerge with an even stronger light. A soul that used darkness itself as a fertilizer for light. You are living proof that this prophecy is active and functioning Malachiel. Every painful experience of his life has been carefully calibrated, not by divine cruelty, but by spiritual engineering. Every trauma had the potential to destroy it or strengthen it, and it was your choice. And at every crossroads, you chose to strengthen yourself. When God saw the devil declaring you as a protected specimen, He smiled, because the devil, unaware, had just confirmed the success of the prophetic experiment. If even the dark forces recognize that you are unexplained by normal standards, then you have transcended these standards. You've become something new. God then summoned the archangels to His own meeting, but the tone was not of concern, as in the

Hell. It was a celebration. Miguel said: "The soul completed the crossing. The light remained intact through total darkness." Gabriel: "And not only remained; it expanded. Each layer of darkness crossed added depth to the light." Jofiel: "The wounds have become sources of healing for other people. This soul now transmits a healing frequency automatically." Uriel concluded: "The prototype worked. We can expand the project." And it was at that moment that God made a decision that will transform not only his life, but the future of mankind. He decided to use you as a model. This means that their spiritual configuration, this seemingly impossible ability to transform darkness into light, will gradually be made available to other souls who choose the same path. You are not just a survivor of your own hell; you are a pioneer of a new way to exist that others can follow. Every time you publicly demonstrate that it is possible to cross the worst and get out better, you are literally opening a way for others to do the same. Their existence is a living permission for others to believe that a radical transformation is possible. The devil wants to study you to understand how to stop this process. God wants to expand it to speed up this process. And you are at the center of a cosmic battle over the future of human consciousness. Now comes the part that connects everything. Do you remember every time you asked yourself, "Why me?" Why did you, specifically, have to go through all that? Why did it seem more tested than the others? Why couldn't life just be easy like everyone else? Now you know. You were designed to cross exactly what you went through. Every dark experience was a necessary ingredient in the recipe that would turn you into who you are. Without the poison, you wouldn't have developed the ability to create the antidote. And the reason it seemed harder for you than for other people is because you

I was being prepared for something others weren't called to do. The intensity of the training corresponds to the magnitude of the mission. You were not punished for difficulties; you were trained through them. And now that the training is over, now that you've proven that you can transform anything that's thrown at you, the harvest phase begins. The opportunities that will begin to appear are not coincidence; they are positionings, to place you exactly where your unique frequency is most needed. People who will begin to enter your life are not random; they are souls who need to testify that radical transformation is possible, and you are living and structural proof of it. The resources that are flowing are not luck; they are necessary tools for a mission that you didn't even know you had, you already know it, but this enhanced judgment, you have the power to bless or curse where your hands point, anywhere in the world is an authority given to your category. It intensifies as you now have two forces working for you simultaneously: infernal protection for curiosity and divine support for purpose. The devil ordered you to leave him alone because he wants to study him. God commanded them to bless him because he wants to expand him. On both sides, the result is the same: your life is about to become significantly easier. Not because you can't stand any more difficulties, you've proven that you can stand anything, but because the training phase is over. Now it's the application phase. And here's the final revelation about what makes it so unique that even the devil stopped everything to observe it: You are one of the few living human beings who can look directly into the abyss without becoming the abyss itself. You experienced the complete darkness and you consciously chose to keep the light on. He knew the depths of human pain and decided to use that knowledge to help others rather than perpetuate the cycle. That makes him more dangerous to hell than angelic armies, because angels never

They experienced the real darkness. They operate from an original purity. They cannot truly relate to humans who are in the midst of chaos. But you can do it. You can look into the eyes of someone who is at the bottom of the well and say with absolute authority: 'I know exactly what it's like to be there. And I know there is a way out, because I left.' That's a credibility no angel has. It is an authority conquered through survival, something that cannot be faked or borrowed. And when you offer hope to someone desperate, your hope has a different weight, because it was tested in the fire, because it went through the darkest night and it's still lit. You're a lighthouse forged in darkness. And the devil knows that every person you reach with your impossible light is a person he loses forever. 5 Ae dragon, I'm pulling all your heads off one by one! The divine armor has three layers of steel on its heel. You're chipped in my real hand. 6 NOTE THIS, yet on the law of sowing. When a person chooses wickedness with the option of choosing good, when he plans destruction against someone who has done him no harm, that heart is marked in the heavenly records. Not as an ordinary sinner, who can easily repent, but as a conspirator against divine property. And this is a very different category of guilt and spiritual weight. There is a verse many know, but few understand in all its depth: 'Do not touch my anointed ones, nor do evil to my prophets.' When God uttered those words, he was not making a kind suggestion. I was establishing a cosmic law with automatic consequences. Touching evil an anointed activates a protection protocol that does not need you to ask for revenge, which does not require you to do anything, which operates

Whether you've forgiven or not who hurt you. Because the protection of the anointed one does not depend on the anointed one; it depends on the One who anointed him. And when someone crosses that line, when they decide to attack someone who carries the invisible mark of the sky, they're not fighting an ordinary human being. You're declaring war on the most powerful army in existence. And guess who loses this war? Always! You carry that mark. 7 Joy(+) has the same potential of sadness(-) at Hertz level as unit of measurement, the difference is interpretation of the feeling that is relative, almost always the reason that leads us to negative feeling is usually a projection towards the real scenario; then even if it takes time, trusting in God, in you and in truth, transmutes this negative feeling internally, first in faith, then in joy by faith, with the same initial power, most of the time interpretation is the key. In the end, what the standard interpretation describes as energy theft after this process becomes a source of energy. There is a Hebrew phrase that transmutes everything that has the interpretation for directing feelings. Gam Zu Le Tová (Hebrew: 8 years and the same game still follows... 9 Seventy mandrake by two soldiers. 10 Sacred compression in the air... 11 And undead, your soul is still with me, only two of the eleven souls came to claim them. Without a soul you don't go very far. That's my value, it's for me, not for you.

12 They forget that hostility is my normalcy. The problem is your custom with what you like about me, that might be only 1% or not. Hostility is my authenticity. 13 God delivered the lions in the pit from Daniel! That's the real one. 14 Genuine compassion at any level generates cosmic celebration, and this vibration generates physical, chemical and psychic conformity at the same level. The standard psychological instruction for this scenario goes far from reality. 15 Time has always been one of my best allies, if you force forces that you can't control, become rivals, you'll stay the same for years calling it strength. Unnecessary force. 16 The second time I died. It was heavier than the first one, for me and because there were people with me too. In April 2011, on a Thursday in the middle of autumn the nights were beginning to cool literally; I can't remember the day of the month because the Jornal de Itupeva lost all the collection where they had reported this and my third, but it disappeared not even here on the face where there was every collection of this newspaper, but I couldn't find it on the website of the Itupeva Guide (if anyone knows about the collection of the Jornal de Itupeva pfvr warns me). Coming back. At that time I worked for Telefonica in São Paulo, returned to Itupeva near 20hs and almost every night I was training at the skateboard in Itupeva. Guess what? Kkkk to this day. On that day, I was on a motorcycle, and at the break of practice 'I got' down at Russi' kkk to get chocolate and a bottle of wine, at that time I was with four more friends all training. I didn't have a purse and I didn't want to go back with both of you.

Little bags hanging from the bike handlebars, I asked a friend who was there to come along and bring things in her hand, even in the bag, it helps a lot. We went to Russi, the market of the epoch that today has another name we bought exactly the two items and we went back to the skateboard by the same way we went, down Jundiaí Street, I remember we used this way because the main Av was in renovations then we went back the same way. At this time of the return, on Jundiaí Street in front of the temple of the JCSUT Church, this must be how it shortened. Right now One crazy blind person left without seeing anything, the million he brings from a van, more than 70K/h with a black Twister, the van was coming in the opposite direction to us on her hand across the street, so imagine the scene, in front of me, at night, on Jundiaí Street, with a fork in my CG 2006; and then a MALUKO with a black Twister invades the wrong hand at seventy per hour, and from the front with me and the girl who was in the back of my bike with a bottle of wine and a chocolate bar. The only functional thought that I manifested was: "I already know it won't be enough time to deviate, if I try to deviate, it will be worse, because his bike will enter at 70 per hour on the side of mine, at this speed, his bike was 40 kg heavier than mine; it will throw the 3 away and we will break, sure." So I did the only thing I could have done to minimize everyone's injuries, and it worked. I faced the black Twister MALUKO who broke into Jundiaí Street against him in 2011 and killed me, his soul tbm is with me. Anyway, It was quick, with a minimum of locomotion of the two bikes, and also of us; What I saw after the hit. I looked for my friend, who was with me, it was my main concern, she was still lying down, but we talked about it, we confirmed that she was really and thank God, everything was fine. Of course the bottle had burst on the floor. When the ambulance came to ask if it was blood.

I got up and I've already filled my mouth and started shooting curses, arguments actually, against the Black Twister MALUKO which in 2011 broke into Jundiá Street in Itupeva and killed me. In that the MALUKO stayed on the ground because he had broken his right toe. I spat a lot of blood to curse him, so I found out why; at the time of the crash my visor was open, so his helmet entered into my helmet the visor flew away, then I caught it still not to lose it was expensive equipment ja, rsrs, it gave me a small cranial fracture on the left supercile, I have the scar on the left eyebrow, of course it opened the skin and blood flowed from there. My trachea was displaced with the crash because his cap tbn entered my neck, waiting for the ambulance I saw it was out and I managed to get back in place, but I had a semi-rupture in the left sternocleidomastoid, from there to ca my body needed to develop 3x plus the scalens on the left side to compensate for this semi-rupture of the sternocleidomastoid, if you notice to see in my photos, the scalens on the left side of the superdeveloped neck, while the left sternocleidomastoid is smaller than the right. We all went to the hospital. The police wouldn't let me see the guy at the hospital. I was walking all crooked because besides my neck, I scraped my knee and opened a 2cm cut on my right hand. Thank God nothing happened to my friend who was with me. No fracture would be thank God, just the one in the left upper ocular skull, the cranium didn't fracture, two weeks and the headaches stopped, burst into the eye, so, you know what? Search, I needed two weeks in bed, 15 days without work on the 7th of April, haunted building of Telefonica,) good memories, 'so reforming will be a condominium of apartments there now'. One observation, the third time and the heavier, was my fault. I say don't accuse me of victimistic or sad little story.

17 And churches, how are the cults of you going without the presence of the Holy Spirit? Normal, right? Nothing's changed, has it? Explains a lot, almost everything. In this new phase, you and the angel of the church. 18 There is a core in you that never gave up your keys. This is not stubborn, it is sovereignty refusing to be ruled by someone below the hierarchy of the kingdom. You feel an almost physical deep discomfort when you see someone being treated as less than they are. The injustice not only bothers you, it offends much of the structural in you. This is because sovereign souls recognize dignity in others by instinct, the way royalty recognizes royalty. You weren't meant to look at the people from above, you were meant to lift them. And seeing them diminished violates the law you carry inside. His life does not accuse deception directly, it is that his change shows that it would also be possible to change. And not everyone wants to be reminded of the responsibility to grow up. That's why some might call their new posture pride. Others may say that you have changed, that you have become distant, that you are different. But the question is, did you get distant, or did you just stop abandoning yourself to maintain fragile bonds? Did you get cold, or did you just learn not to surrender your soul to every proposal? Those who accuse their evolution are only lamenting the loss of the old access. This is a delicate phase, because the chosen one must resist the temptation to explain himself too much. 19 The message God has for you today is not warning, it is liberation.) Because while they're trying to map where you are, you're already in a place they can't reach. Tracking in the physical world means following footprints, it means collecting data, building a map, understanding someone's trajectory. In the spiritual world, tracking works the same way, but with different tools. It's the silent visits to your social media profiles through available apps seeking to eliminate traces. Indications without responsibility that end up attracting to you everything you fear with the false illusion of protection. They're the questions asked to third parties about what you've been doing, who you've been walking with, what you've been winning. It's the quick glances exchanged when your name is mentioned in a conversation. And why do people trace it? Because they need a reference. When one feels that he has fallen behind, the human mind compulsively seeks to understand where the other is. Not to celebrate, to calculate the distance. To measure how much you would need to run to get where you came from or to find a reason to justify why you don't deserve to be there. That's not new. Joseph, the son of Jacob, was tracked by his own brothers before it was even sold. They watched him, calculated, felt that there was something about him that wasn't in them, and it bothered them at a level that they could only prosecute through betrayal. The screening that preceded the sale of Joseph did not begin with action, began with looking, with monitoring, with the need to understand what was in that young man who made his father love him differently. You're being tracked, you know that, there's something about you that others recognize before you recognize yourself, and that recognition, when not accompanied by character, turns into vigilance. It's no accident, it's not paranoia. The genuine chosen carries a spiritual mark that affects the surrounding environment, even when it does absolutely nothing. The presence of the anointed alters the temperature of space, and when someone changes the environment just because it exists, others feel, not always with clarity, but always with intensity. David is the most powerful example of this. Before he was crowned king of Israel, when facing Goliath before all the people, Saúl sent messengers to find out where David was already monitoring his movements, counting the warriors who followed him. Saúl was tracking David not because David was a clear threat, but because the Spirit of God had departed from Saúl and rested upon David, and Saúl felt this transfer at each meeting. Saúl's tracking was actually an involuntary confession. He knew that the anointed had changed their address. When God moves someone into a different dimension, those left behind do not become neutral, they become restless, and the restlessness, without inner transformation, becomes vigilance. The tracking you are experiencing is not evidence of weakness, it is evidence of anointing. Nobody monitors people who don't represent anything. No one tracks footprints of anyone who's not going anywhere. Here is one of the greatest dangers for the chosen one who knows he is being tracked: the temptation to perform for the eyes that monitor you, to adjust your posts, your conversations, your visible choices so that the trackers can confirm what you know about yourself, so that they see and recognize, so that the victory is validated by the same ones who doubted. Seems harmless, seems fair, but it's a trap with teeth. When you begin to live for the confirmation of the wrong eyes, you transfer your spiritual authority to the wrong audience. You depend on someone's eyes to feel on top. And any day you're not looking, you feel like you're down. Jesus never responded to the provocations of the Pharisees with demonstrations of power to impress them. When they asked for signs, he did not perform miracles to satisfy the curiosity of those who did not want to believe, he just wanted to collect evidence. He acted for his father. He lived for an audience of one. And this attitude was not indifference to the world, it was mission protection. Because when you start acting in the wrong eyes, you stop acting in the right eyes. Don't prove you're up, don't prove anything to small minds. Keep going up. There is a huge difference between the two postures and God knows each one of them. We need to talk about what it means to be on top already. Because if you understand this only as a financial position, or as social recognition, or as reach on social networks, you will spend your whole life thinking you haven't gotten there yet. Kkkkk comes to be funny. All the people who tell you to take care of yourself more are completely lost. This is confirmed every day. 20 For those who have not yet read, or even knew that there is, The Apocalypse of Paul, is legitimate, and it pays a lot to read several times. 21 So far, it was only white horses, so in the reds the siege tightens, 22 You've already understood that this in you, it's not a skill that someone could teach you, it's much stranger, it's a way to deal with what would have flattened other people, a capacity to keep something alive in you that, for all reasonable measure, should have died years ago on several occasions. And you never called it power, you called it nothing, you called it my problem, remember? The reason you feel things too deep, the reason you can't let go the way others can, the reason the weight always seems to fall on you. But underneath that, you knew there was something in there, that operation running inside you that you never called and can't turn off. Something that just does what you do, time after time, whether you understand it or not, for a long time, for a long time. Today you found out what it is. And because a being who witnessed the entire story of the order created, who stood in the presence of the throne and delivered the most important messages ever spoken, looked at you and took something to write, let me take you to a place first. In the order of the invisible; there is a being whose entire function is to record and deliver, a very famous name since the beginning of the ages, a messenger of God. Not a warrior, something rarer. The one who carries the most significant communications throughout the structure of existence. And to carry them, you need to understand them completely first. To do that, he observes, he documents, he watched everything unfold. And almost nothing he sees is new to him at this point. Think about what that means. A being who saw everything, who catalogued every kind of human response throughout the passage of recorded existence. That there's a category for everything, because everything has happened in front of him at least once. A being like that doesn't take notes, there's nothing left to write down. He knows what he'll see before he sees, because he's seen the equivalent of it a thousand times over the ages. So when a being like that stops and takes something to register, it means he's found something that doesn't fit in any category he has. Something that has no precedent in all the records he kept. Something new, somewhere where nothing should be new anymore. Your life produced this. I know the resistance, what you're thinking right now, for you. The voice saying, 'Me? How? rrsrs his patterns, 'in a way' sarcasm even with me,. - Surely the great messenger of heaven who is not omnipresent has more important things to observe and places + important to be than my ordinary, complicated and dull life...? Let the voice rise and then keep listening, because in the end the evidence will be stopped in its own memory. Look back honestly with me. Think about the things you went through. Not the easy times, the ones that should have ended something in you, the losses that should have made you bitter and somehow didn't. Betrayals that should have closed his heart and somehow made him more malleable. The tiredness that should have made you cruel, and then instead, it made you kinder to other people who were suffering. You have a strange habit and maybe you never noticed. You take what you should

Poison you and somewhere inside you, without deciding, you turn into something that doesn't poison you. You should be a lot more adamant than you are for math than you have. You should be colder, tighter, more broken than you are. And you're not, you've never fully explained why. This isn't luck, this isn't just about being a good person, honesty these things. That's a power operating, one so silent and so constant that you've always, your whole life confused him with your personality. Breathe here, at this point, because this is the center of everything I need to show you right now. I need to tell you what this power really is and why heaven itself seemed to have forgotten that it was possible. There is a capacity that has been woven into the original design of the human soul, a capacity so high that over the ages it has been treated as theoretical. Something that could exist in principle, but that almost no soul has actually developed, because developing this requires going through exactly the kind of pain that most souls either avoid or are destroyed by it. The ability is this, to take what was sent to break you and instead of breaking, instead of merely surviving, instead of merely enduring, transforming, receiving the darkness and returning light, receiving the bitterness and producing tenderness, taking the raw material of everything that was done to shut you down and quietly forge in it the very thing that makes you more alive. No avoidance, no anesthesia, not pretending it didn't hurt, transformation, getting the poison completely inside of you, feeling all of it and then doing something with it that the poison should never allow, remember that wolf spider bite in 2023? You just looked into it, realized that the poison didn't kill and went on living with that pain for days until it passed, in that size a spider like that can paralyze by anaphylactic attack a child up to 50 kilos depending on the blood composition... This ability so far remained in the invisible records, as something that belonged to the original design, but had gone, for all intents and purposes.

practical, dormant since Paul, remember? I know you do. A power that heaven knew the soul was made to have, but that it had seen being exercised so rarely, at such a high cost, that it had derived far from what one actually expected to find. And then his life began to produce him. Not once, as a pattern, as a reflex, time after time, the same impossible operation, pain inside, light out, no training, no teacher, without you even knowing what you were doing. And here's the part that'll tear you apart if you let it. When this pattern became undeniable in his record, the great messenger, the being who saw everything, who has a category for everything, who long since ceased to expect to be surprised, did the one thing he almost never does. He stopped and started writing, not because he had to file a routine report, but because he was watching a capacity that records treated as almost mythical operating in real time in a common human life. He was watching something that the sky had silently filed as too rare to expect, alive again, in you. And a being whose whole function is to understand before delivering, couldn't let that go without registering. He took note, about you, about the mechanics of how you do the thing you think is nothing, about the way you get what you should destroy and return something you have no right to become. He studied a human being the way a master studies something he thought was lost. Imagine this, the one who stood before the throne, who carried the weight of the most important words ever spoken, focused on his life, with the focus of someone witnessing something he will need to report. Because what you carry was significant enough to rule up the hierarchy. You did this, not performing, not being holy in any way that you would recognize, doing silently, without applause, the one thing almost no soul ever learns to do. Turn your worst times into sources of your permanent light.

You didn't feel it happen because the darkness made a point of leaving you as residue. The feeling that your pain was your pain, that your survival was just survival, that the thing you do isn't anything special just you being too soft, too sensitive, too sensitive, so you could carry a domain and believe it was a defect. Now look back through this and watch your life turn upside down. You read your sensitivity as weakness, your inability to stay cold as a failure to protect yourself. The fact that you keep feeling, continuing to care, continuing to expand after being injured, you read all of this until a certain time ago as proof that you didn't learn to protect yourself properly. But it's the exact opposite. What if the thing you called weakness was the machinery of one of the rarest forces there is? What if your refusal to stay cold wasn't a failure of self-protection, but the engine of a power that requires you to keep your mind open to work? What if every time you felt 'too much' and turned it, instead of turning it into a weapon, if you weren't failing to harden, if you were operating a capacity that most human souls never access in their entire existence? You weren't too soft. You were spinning a power that only works through the softness of spirit and thick shell in the experience. The hardness you were trying to develop would have shut it down. The opening you kept apologizing for is exactly the thing that makes you capable of what almost the whole sky thought you might never see again. And here's what the enemy works most to hide. There's been an old line written for a long time: We are troubled from all sides, but not crushed. Killed, but not destroyed. For life to manifest itself in us. Tribulated, but not crushed. Killed, but not destroyed. Pressure was never the end of the story. Pressure was the process. The crushing should produce something. And in you, it produced. You were never just bearing the weight. You were converting him all the time. Now, let me give you five signs that this power is already operating on you. The first sign is that you recover from things that should have ruined you. And you can't fully explain how. People look at what you went through and who you are now and they don't close the account. The damage should be greater, remember now recent of the last fds in RJ and the bumps you took? All 256 hands on the floor to protect the face, common to you ne? rsrs That skeet on the chin that you yourself gave yourself trying to climb that quarter? You scared me, I saw it, but no more than the mother of the boy who was on your side, kkkkk she tried to acurd you 'too much' but you kept the posture pretending it didn't hurt, just confirmed if you hadn't opened your chin, if there was no blood, surprisingly there was no show that everything was fine and went on, everyone who saw it was paralyzed there needing a time to process what they saw and keep going on with their lives. Yes, you did, but you didn't let the weight go to anyone and today, how are you? You don't even remember the pain, but you remember all the experiences, don't you? That's worth a lot. The fact that it's not impacted is power working silently underneath. The second sign is that pain tends to make you more compassionate, no longer bitter. Where others get stiff, you flex. Where others close, you open more. You've seen the suffering leave cruel people and felt the pull to cruelty in yourself, but you identified and chose to be different from the pattern. Something about you keeps choosing the other direction, almost automatically. This automatic turn is the domain. The third sign is that you carry a strange and silent gratitude for some of your worst experiences and remember all the people who helped you pass through them directly or indirectly. It doesn't make sense, and you might even feel guilty about it. But you can see how the hardest things shaped the best parts of you. And some part of you wouldn't trade them,

Contrary to your gratitude, you clearly demonstrate that you would go through everything again. That perspective is not normal. It's the signature of power. The fourth sign is that people with the same pain are attracted to you without knowing why. They tell you things, feel safe around you without having the language for it, it's that you're someone who knows how to hold heavy things without being crushed by them. They're responding to this power, which doesn't come from you but flows through you, even if you never name it. The fifth sign is that you've always felt that you carry something that you can't identify right, a capacity, a depth, a function that runs itself. You've felt it your whole life and never had a word to say it. Today you do. What you carry 'is nothing' is the rarest thing that celestial records keep. 23 Summary of the first game in the cup: The weather at the moment must have been good, smiles for cameras, performance to get out well in the scene (3 IQ.Zero and the model that trusted everything for the scene), left a tense scenario so comfortable, the general sympathy was overwhelming to the point that no one could guarantee the reason why they were there. Result: 3 arrests and a grieving family. 24 What's meant for survival is not normally meant for love. The body learns to protect itself, the mind to control, and the soul learns silence as a comfortable defense. Hence the patterns, relationships in which there is more delivery or only it, moments when you expect a signage that never comes, experiences in which you need to guess the other to not feel invisible. This creates an internal grammar of scarcity. And breaking that grammar requires conscience, not guilt, because guilt only arrests. Consciousness guides. When you understand that certain repetitions have a greater root than the current situation, you begin to treat your own history with less cruelty. Do you realize that not always

I was overreacting. Sometimes I was reacting to the sum of many old absences. The spirit breathes a little better when it finds language for its own wound, and it is not comfortable. Breathing is not just physiology, it becomes a sign of internal space. And internal space is the first step towards any real reorganization. Without it, the soul is squeezed between what it feels and what it thinks it should feel. I'll give you that advice again. I would listen to the pause between one sentence and another, because that is where a lot of important things live. Human beings usually talk about what happened, but they don't always talk about what was vibrating after. And it is in this residual vibration that changes begin or stop. You've been through situations that have triggered not only emotions, but your identity, your way of seeing yourself, your sense of merit. With the way to trust what the heart perceives. This is serious. When an experience touches the internal structure, it does not end in the event. It remains in the body, memories, dreams, little habits, the way you read silence. So I'll tell you again: what you feel matters, even when it doesn't fit into an explanation. And if the body has reacted, sleep has been irregular, specific times, if the mind insists on revisiting memories, then something there wants to be understood more carefully. Not to dramatize, but to honor the experience, even if the end is the cut, it's also a conclusion. There is a dignity in looking at what passes us through. And there is also a responsibility, not to give up your own peace for hasty interpretations. Mature learns to distinguish what is noise and what is called. Still, when the call is true, it repeats itself with insistent gentleness, gentleness, not numbness; as one who knocks at the door, but without violence, but without giving up. And perhaps the most impressive thing is to realize that behind the apparent confusion, there is a principle of correction in progress. Life doesn't always correct the way we hope or the end you'd like. Sometimes she corrects moving people, undoing scenarios, removing certainties that sustained an illusion. That hurts, of course, because the human likes security even when security is small. But there are pains that serve to align the internal compass. You may have felt this as losses, disappointments, disappearances, incomplete returns, or as that strange feeling of being prepared for a greater truth without having control over the calendar. This type of process is not only measured by dates, it is measured by the quality of consciousness that is born after. What do you think of yourself now? What don't you accept anymore? What does your body refuse with a wisdom that once had no voice? These are questions of who is coming out of the automatic and entering into a thinner perception. And when that happens, even memories change places inside us. They cease to be prison and begin to be living testimony. The heart does not forget, but learns not to surrender to any impulse. And it's affective maturation. That's silent courage, it's harvest. 25 One gossip always delivers the others. Law of nature! It's one of the marks of the beasts. Every passage with the word ?lie? read in the Bible, you must interpret/replace by gossip: to judge, good or bad, those who are not present soon cannot defend themselves, is the wheel of mockers/scoffers. The lie is relative, from the margin to the charge on which it depends from the point of view. Not gossip, she stalks you until she finds you again. And it doesn't depend on interpretation or point of view. It's a Portuguese translation error. 26 You don't complain, you like it, you take it with an open heart. Accepted by your level of love for the experience, you put yourself in this willingness to appreciate life as it is, without wanting to control it, it is obvious that you accept the differences between people. You have no prejudices within you. If you had, from yesterday to back, you've been breaking it, because you love the slaps on your face that life gives you in the sense of teaching you to break down your own false structures, false ideologies of reality, that keeps you in a security that is not comfortable, that traps you and makes you imprison others around. So because you put yourself in this need, you developed the free, wild spirit, of being in constant movement and mutation, that's where you become a danger in many places. And that's when these people look at you and wonder, where did I miss, the moment of his quantum leap?

27 My job is to study tú, ñm ask how, only work tbm. 28 Do you know how the inventory and the sharing of inheritance were made at the time of the Law? The firstborn received all the inheritance and then shared with the brothers what was theirs, by respecting the authority of the parents while they were still alive. The law has not changed, we have adapted to live in society, but the law has not changed. 29 In my childhood the kamikaze were almost always undervalued, today they are the most wanted. 30 The game of regulated man is always the same: Good to see you after more. I acquired a peculiar taste for these challenges $e=mc^2$, sharpens.) 31 If you were really just too intense as they always wanted to classify you, how would you handle all your responsibilities? Intense people don't go through what you went through without a few people knowing, they all wonder when it was all this? Something's not right. rrsrsr Let me take you to a place that hardly anyone sees.

In the invisible world there is a symbol that is placed on certain souls, even before they enter the body. The old language would call it a stamp. Not a garnish, not just symbolism. A seal is a mark of possession and protection, pressed into the very core of a soul, declaring that this here belongs to the highest authority that exists, and that anything that comes against it, must respond to that authority first. Most souls aren't sealed like that. They are loved, cared for, but are not marked in the nucleus with this specific type of alliance. It is reserved for souls who have been sent into the world with something specific to manifest. Something that darkness would try, with everything it has, to destroy before it could be brought to the end. A sealed soul can be attacked. This is important for you to understand. The seal doesn't stop the blows. What he does is stop the blows from doing what they were sent for. An attack falls on a sealed soul and finds, just below the surface, something that it cannot overcome. It can hurt, it can exhaust, it can leave scars, but it can't reach the core, it can't break what was sent to break, because the core is sealed and the seal responds to a power that nothing in darkness can undo. And here's what hardly anyone understands about how this works. Darkness can read souls. She studies them. And when she finds a sealed soul, she sees the seal and gets angry because of it, because a seal is the only thing that the enemy of her soul cannot remove. Can't argue and make it go away, can't buy, can't steal. He was placed by an infinitely higher authority than darkness, and darkness has no power to break him. All she can do is attack the soul again and again, in the hope that if she can't break the seal directly, she can wear the soul to the point where the soul gives up on its own, where she forgets that it's sealed and delivers something that the darkness could never take away by force. This is the war that came being locked on to you your whole life. Because here's the part where the enemy of your soul worked harder to stop you from knowing. The most powerful force of all darkness, the one that contemporary language calls Lucifer, does not waste his attention with ordinary souls. He has smaller powers for that. He turns his own focus to souls he considers genuinely dangerous. And on that day, time and place, at the very point of his life his soul crossed with his attention. He started studying you, looking for some way to get in, some crack, some weakness, a place where the right pressure applied at the right time would bring you down completely. And he faced the seal. I want you to understand what this moment was like in the invisible world, because you lived through the effects of it without ever knowing the cause. He recognized the seal for what it was, a mark that he could not break, placed by the only authority to whom he has ever had to answer pine. And it made him angry. So he did what he always does when he can't break a stamp directly. He's committed to breaking you down the long way. Attack after attack, time after time, loss after loss. Not because any blow alone would shatter the seal, he knew it wouldn't, but because he was betting that enough blows, over enough years, would wear you to the point where you would break yourself. That's why your life carried the weight you carried. The insistence of that. The way the attacks never seemed to stop. The way you barely recovered from one thing before the next one arrived. That wasn't random bad luck. That was a campaign calculated by a force that couldn't break what was inside you, trying to exhaust you until you gave it up. And here's the moment that has placed the blessing on you forever. He failed every single time. Every blow he sent fell on the seal and stopped. Every time he designed to break you has left you healed, exhausted, but broken in the core, sealed. He's in it for the full length of your life, with all the power and patience and cunning you have. And the seal held through every charge. The proof is not in some distant heavenly record. The proof is that you're still here, breathing, listening to this. You are the living evidence that the most powerful force of darkness has thrown everything you had against the seal on your soul for years and failed to break it. That's what made the invisible world amazing. Not a battle won by its strength, the vision of a soul that should have been destroyed many times, still standing, still sealed, still whole, because the mark on it responded to a power that the darkness could never undo. Now look back in your life, your whole life, and watch her reorganize in front of you. You spent years reading your survival as something wrong. You thought you barely made it. You thought it was a bad time, some collapse. You prepared for the next coup because you were sure your strength was still being tested. You were never surviving, you were being "supernaturally protected" in the core this whole time. The reason you went through this evidence wasn't that you were strong enough. But something inside you couldn't be broken, no matter how strong the attack was. The insistence of the opposition was not proof of your kkkk intensity, but proof of how heavily sealed you are! Darkness only fights so hard against what they cannot break. You were never the fragile wall about to collapse under the next flood. You've been the sealed soul that darkness has failed to break as long as you've been alive. You only felt every blow, but you never saw the seal protect you from them. The old words knew that long before you were born. There's a phrase written in a long time ago that says, He sealed us and pledged the spirit in our hearts. He sealed us. A pledge, a mark of possession that cannot be reversed, declaring that the one who carries it belongs to the highest authority and is kept by it. That was never about people who were just encouraged. It was about people who were sealed, marked in the core, protected by a power that nothing can undo, so that the symbol needs to be visible. The seal that's on you. Again I must give you five signs that the seal in your soul is real, five is the number of man subject to God: The first sign is that you've seen others go through less than you've been through and not come back. You wondered why you came back "normal" when they didn't. It wasn't that you were stronger, it was that you were sealed, and the blow that couldn't reach your core managed to reach theirs. The second sign is that the attacks against you have been insistent in a way that doesn't match a common life. Things have come against you again and again, time after time, beyond what seems fair or normal. That insistence is not bad luck, it's the signature of a force that can't break you directly, trying to wear you out instead. The third sign is that you arrive at a breaking point and then, somehow, you don't break, more than normal, more than "acceptable" and come back. You've been on the edge so many times, only you've learned from early and held on beyond everyone else, and then something underneath you held together, and more, something you can't explain has made it simple, not totally conscious, but clear. That something is the seal doing exactly what was put there to do. The fourth sign is that you recover from things that should leave permanent damage. You were wounded in ways that should have hardened you forever, and yet you keep coming back to yourself. The scars remain, but the core remains whole. That's a sealed soul healing from a place the damage couldn't reach. The fifth sign It's just that after all, the deepest part of you is untouched. You may be tired, you may be healed, but somewhere underneath everything, the truest part of you, the part you love, that waits, that extends into the light is still there, broken. This survival of its core, through all that has been done to destroy it, is itself.

Seal, still holding, and that symbol echoes away, changes the structure of the air and reverberates in all your friends, many have noticed and you get the whole echo back. This is the game, nothing is lost everything echoes forever. 32 A warrior, you appear here not as someone who beats everyone, but as one who supports his own truth without abandoning himself. And it takes daily courage to say no when the body contracts, to rest when the guilt presses; you learned that look and then understood how it works; you also learned to ask for help when the pride weapon defenses, it is rare that most operate only within a range of emotions and run away from the others, literally hide, and that is structural preparation, you will still use it a lot. The inner work begins in discrete, almost invisible gestures, and deepens when you stop romanticizing pain and begin to hear it as messenger. The soul doesn't just want relief, it wants integration. If you notice honestly, you may find that repeating your standards is not an accident, but a language. The same frustration with different faces, the same choice ending in emptiness, the same inner promise that now it will be different and yet the old wound reappears. This is usually the complex that speaks louder than conscious will. Complexes are emotional nodes that capture psychic energy and make you react as if the present was the past. So you can feel small in situations that rationally seem simple. The body goes on alert, the throat closes, the mind chases justifications and its shadow its negative thoughts use to whisper that you "always fail", "always delay", "always spoils" when none of this is true. But that voice is not its center, it is a wounded part trying to control pain by repetition and malignant voices also echoing especially in some territorial psychic fields. When you start watching her without merging with her, that accusing voice, understand it and finally have the security to despise it; something gets loose. That's where the inner transformation really begins. The lead of automatism is placed in the fire of consciousness, not for you to destroy yourself, but for excess to burn and remain only the essential. Perhaps a practical question will help: in what moments are you reacting more to what you have lived than what is really happening now? Only this question, asked honestly, already opens a rift of light. Often you call intuition what fear is, and you call prudence what escape is. The soul, however, is more precise than panic. She knows when something deserves caution and when an opportunity is being turned down for trauma. This discernment is not born of a controlling mind, but of a refined listening of the body, of dreams, of the quality of silence. The inner blessing usually emerges when life removes distractions so that you face what is left. And what's left at first scares me. The loneliness, the feeling of inadequacy, the desire to be seen without needing to act, the tiredness of supporting a version of yourself that no longer vibrates. The wise soul, in these moments, does not appear as a great figure, but as the voice that says: stay. Stay in the face of discomfort, without immediately fleeing to the known habit. Stay with the tear that won't come out. Stay with the unanswered question. Discover both sides of your I am asking for that kind of presence, because every escape reinforces fragmentation. And when you remain, what seemed to be a threat, it can prove to be instruction. There is a knowledge that does not enter by haste, but by the maturation of pain. It's like dark water turning into a mirror. Only when the slipstream is low, do you see the face of the truth itself. At this point, practice is simple and profound at the same time. Breathing, naming what you feel, writing what you repeat, observing what your body does before each choice. Small acts of lucidity open large inner corridors. The wounded soul usually protects itself with hardness, but this hardness charges a very high price.

Loud. (It creates distance, rigidity, intolerance to error, need to explain everything, fear of depending, fear of being touched in the most sensitive place. On the outside, you might look strong. Inside, there may be a psychic child in surveillance, ready to hide at the slightest sign of threat. The shadow, negative thoughts, in this case, are not only what you reject in yourself, but also the place where your fragility was trapped and wounded. When this material emerges, it is not uncommon to feel shame, as if feeling deep was a defect and not a pathway of knowledge. But depth is not an exaggeration, it is a form of soul intelligence. The problem is not in feeling too much, but in not knowing what to do with what you feel. Therefore, a gesture of integration can be as simple as observing without condemning. When the anger rises, ask her what she protects. When sorrow comes, ask what she's lost. When anxiety accelerates the chest, ask her what she fears will happen if you rest. And this self-knowledge begins when emotion ceases to be an enemy and becomes a raw material. But if integration is needed, it helps a lot. 33 His whole life is written, and we, God even, feel in real time every letter written by hand in his book, he bears his name, but it is written, analyzed and fully enjoyed by the kingdom of heaven. Every time we saw it and wrote it down, you chose to resist rather than give up. God felt and expressed as evidence of extraordinary character each time you faced adversities without victimizing yourself.) He recorded as a demonstration of rare spiritual maturity each time you persisted when everyone close to you who in theory should defend you, saw you as an emotional masochist and mocked, only because they would have abandoned you. But He silently celebrated his connection with the superior force structured to you. His resistance revealed something that impressed the Creator. You had found out naturally how to access reserves of force that exist beyond common human resistance. Not through learned techniques or taught methods, but through an instinctive connection with the inexhaustible source of power. They saw you suffering and assumed that your resistance was a result of stubbornness or fear of change. They did not understand that you were operating from a different dimension of force, a force that did not depend on favorable circumstances or external support, but on a direct connection with a power that transcends temporary limitations. God recognized that connection because He's her source. I saw you accessing naturally divine resources that most people don't even know exist. I observed you demonstrating a practical faith that works even when theoretical faith fails, faith in practice proves you to extremes that inevitably make you inevitable, learned to sharpen the sickle as it should and already to it handling like no one on Earth yet. And this It impressed him deeply.) Because resistance fed by higher sources is rare, but you've always been backed up. Most people resist while still owning their own energy while seeing possibilities while receiving encouragement. But you resisted even when your energy was exhausted, when the possibilities were invisible, when there was no encouragement, remember your jargon? "When you're really tired, at last, that's where you really show your skills." Why settle everything at the peak of energy, rested, fed and supported almost 50% of those who proposed to do so. But who then hits with quality, having fun and without complaining when there is no physical strength left? "The Brain always gets tired before the body" remember that phrase? It's not always real, but you've always fought like it is, like it always is. It was. And it is, because your ability to keep resisting when resisting seemed illogical proved to God that you had developed a genuine connection with higher dimensions of strength; that your faith was not theoretical, but functional; that their hope was not naivety, but wisdom about the nature of reality. There is something in solitary resistance that touches God's heart in a unique way. Not the performance resistance that seeks admiration, nor the strategic persistence that calculates rewards, but the silent resistance that continues to function even when there is no audience, when there are no guarantees, when there is no visible hope. You demonstrated this rare resistance. He kept fighting when no one recorded his victories. He continued to resist when his battles were not recognized. It continued to persist when persistence seemed to have no purpose. And every moment of solitary resistance was recorded in the divine heart as a symphony played on a frequency that few can access. Every time you resisted alone, you created a reverberation in the celestial dimensions. Every moment he persisted without support generated admiration in the higher spheres. God watched you face betrayals without becoming a traitor. He saw you endure injustices without becoming unjust. He watched you experience cruelty without hardening your own heart to protect yourself. And this broke all the standards He had observed in mankind. Because untainted resistance is a miracle that few can manifest. Most people resist while maintaining their purity, but eventually allows difficulties to alter their essence. It develops cynicism as protection. It hardens the heart as a survival strategy. He loses compassion as a way to avoid more pain. But you resisted keeping your integrity complete. You faced storms without allowing the storms to enter you. He sustained attacks without absorbing the poison from the attacks. You crossed the darkness without allowing darkness to dwell in you. This created an admiration in the divine heart that transcended heavenly expectations. His resistance did not have a hidden agenda to impress God. He was not seeking to manipulate divine favor. I wasn't trying.

to negotiate with the sky through demonstrations of strength. It was simply the natural expression of a soul that recognizes the intrinsic value of persistence. And God can no longer contain Your answer. All this time, He watched every nuance of his lonely resistance. Every moment you choose to continue rather than give up. Every moment he chose to resist instead of surrender. Every decision you've made to persist rather than abandon. It's not just recognition for your ability to resist. It's amazing how you resisted. It's not applause for the force shown. It is enchanted by the quality of the resistance manifested. God is impressed with you in the same way that an artist is impressed with a work that overcomes the limitations of the material itself; just as a teacher marvels at a student who transcends the limitations of the curriculum itself. Your resistance has proven that true strength is a choice, not an accident. It proved that genuine persistence is an accessible possibility, not a privilege of few. It proved that purified resistance can arise through commitment to eternal values. 34 Five days ago, a witch appeared to me in a dream, angry, saying that seven witches including her, were trying to cast spells using demonic hosts against me, but they all returned consecutively, causing in their lives everything they sent to me. Their anger in question was the high vibration emanated to the point of disturbing those who work with the power of darkness even more than a hundred kilometers away. How did I, "without being initiated" or having attended any school of magic reach that degree?! KKKK I laughed a lot, to the point of demoralizing him, I felt his appearance changing at the time to a certain amazement, then I stopped and explained that it just seemed, I explained that I am no longer a student, I have. Today I'm a master at the only magic school that really teaches the power of the source, without any crosser that charges all possible prices, at that time she knew what and who I was talking about, and then again the feature exchange. rsrsrs This is a weapon of ours that the enemy will never be able to reproduce. That's what she thought at that moment; it was then, at that point in the conversation, the witch understood, understood me and understood what I was saying. He said the light doesn't come from a delivery of mine, but from a conscience sealed in me before I was born here. Who doesn't charge me with his power. So she understood everything, and once again the exchange of feature, this time for a sadness, of who had understood something that until then found fantasy, yes, many who work for the realm of darkness do not know that they are in the way of their own perdition, first of their time, after physical health and finally, of the soul, is when everything becomes harder to change and this experience will go down to the point of nothing left of the person, of life, only work to meet the demonic need of some territorial entity, since ALL are. They're not like us, free to come and go. At the end of this brief conversation, she told me that she wanted to have continued this path that I made. Because now she has managed to understand, that this path "of right." I even smiled at her. I could see beauty there, I woke up scared in the sequence. When this happens, God gives you the memory of the dream in the details. Two days ago, God told me that the seven witches involuntarily lost all powers conquered through the occult. If you're a witch, reading this, you've thought about doing the same, I'd ask your boss first. Because there's an order there with you already on me. 35 + one week fd. Sweat and blood, 36 See with his propios ojos lo que un a soul humane just managed, Miguel comentó: In all the millenios that he luchado, I have never seen al commander en esa positiono. This soul achieves that whole angelic ejercitos in consiguieron. Gabriel observant: La fuerza viene de integrity internal tan solid que ni las dimensiones sombrías pueden penetrare. Rafael analizó: This conciencia in only resists oscuridad, transforms dolor en compasión, es es es alchemia spiritual level that seldom present. Uriel declares: This entiend soul that truly power in the able to destroy, bell able to preserve integrity by destroying would be bad easy. And intoces Dios hablo con decree that I resonate through all the dimensions. This soul has proven its essence, active. Three words that change your destiny completely. Before embodying you were part of the heavenly legions, as Ángel guardián común, as an expert en operaciones que requieren integrity absolute bajo presión extreme. Misiones from which entities infiltrate dimensiones oscuras to cast souls back. Operations from where a solo error means complete failure. You were designated because you possessed moral code so deeply grated that ni exposición prolonged to oscuridad podría corruptorlo. Los Arcángeles te llamaban El incorruptible, El Mallarck. Pero llegó un momento from which you dominated this kind of mision. Sabías como mantener integrity cuando tenías angelical power, complete memory, absolute certainty, and you wanted to know, ¿puedo mantener esa integrity si olvido quién soy? Is that a real midget experiment? -Si Estoy vulnerable and solo? You volunteered for the difficult prueba, incarnate as human and see if you are still intact by completely forgetting your naturalness. Ya just passar, mantuviste integrity included sin reminiscent that eres celestial warrero, preserved principles including experimenting genuine human meedo, elected compasion on venganza included sin conscious memory, tu esencia guerrera permanecio intact, crossing the complete velo of the oblivion. In the desarrollo of character, eternal naturality manifesting itself through time. It is time that there is a termino prueba, las memorias comienzan recresando, probably ya tuviste flashes, sueños donde luchas batallas imposibles, conocimiento que apareceu sin haber estudiado. In es imaginación, son fragments of heavenly consciousness being restored. Cuando Dios decreto, activatenla completely. Los arcángeles recibieron specific operating orders. Remove all the limitations that estaban deliberately containing your complete frecuencia to allow normal human experience, gradually restore conscious access to skills and conocimientos that you pose before embodying, connect energetically with the red of other celestial warriors that are currently in similar missions in the human plane and provide direct support and resources necessary for you to fulfill your function sin material obstacles. This means in concrete terms that you will be commencing by turning from maneras that van to seem miraculous the extraordinarily fortunate, pero son merely the result of direct celestial support coordinated. Complicated financiers currently facing van to resolve themselves through opportunities which van to appear exactly in the context of the necesites, no por suerte ciega o coincidencia fortuitita, by strategic position coordinated directly by the archangels that hour explicit tienen orders to facilitate you. toxic relations that drain you energy van a naturally disolverse sin drama o conflicto. Personas merely van a salir de tu vida, van a findra razones propios para distancinge, por su frecuencia ya no va a resonar con tu tu fracuencia alta después de activación. Right opportunities aligned with the purpose of van to appear with synchronicity that will appear impossible. You are in the right place at the right time, finding the right personas repeatedly. Why have you become fortunate, because you have a complete team of entities

Heavenly working specifically to ensure that you tend every need. Pero hay bad that is going to happen. You simply see physics in environments go to comenzar activating awakening in other personas, sin que hagas nothing specific deliberately, soil for existing and irradiating the frecuencia that you have unrolled. It is a timid person who casually and suddenly comes to you taking bad decisions, you energize potential activity sleeping in ella. Be a friend who was the point of giving up important sweat and después to talk to you, I decided to try one bad time. You frecuencia transfer fuerza to el. In the eres mas individuando batallas personales aisladas, eres catalizador walking que aactivación en todos que entran en tu fieldo energia. You have turned faro viviente e tu luz no puede ser contenido o hida. Ahora come there part that is simultaneously exciting and challenging to understand. You official function, la reason primaria por la cual have volunteered for this specific incarnation, is being fully activated for conscious operation. Eres part of massive celestial operation that is occurring ahora mismo in the human plane. A coordinated initiative that involves approximately 3,000 warriors exactly like you, scattered strategically throughout the planet, each one activates in the precise moment coordinated. La mision es apparently simple, pero deep compleja: anclar frecuencia de integrity incorruptible directly in the collective human energy field. 37 Baki and his synchronicities, best time for the Miyamoto Musashi final season. 39 The nervous system, trained since childhood, interprets calm as something suspicious and chaos as something familiar. And what's familiar, even when it hurts, seems safer than the unknown, even when the unknown is objectively better for you. This has a name in attachment psychology: activation anxiety. By this pattern, the more inconsistent someone is with you, the hotter and colder, present and absent, the stronger you tend to become your attachment to that person. Not because she's better, but because her nervous system goes into a constant state of alertness, trying to resolve the inconsistency. And that state of alertness is often interpreted by the brain as passion. Do you realize now why that particular person, and not someone else, occupies so much space in your mind? It's not because she's the most compatible with you. It's probably because she looks like the first person who taught her that love could hurt, too. When we talk about the paternal complex and the maternal complex: unconscious structures formed in the first relationships with our care figures, which then become invisible filters through which we choose or, more precisely, we are chosen without realizing our partners in adulthood. You believe that you freely choose who you love, but there is a program running beneath your conscience, written even before you learn to read. This program filters out every possible partner and discards almost automatically anyone who does not fit the pattern your unconscious recognizes as love. And that doesn't mean there's anything wrong with you. Doesn't mean you're broke, or that you're too much or too little. It's psychic architecture. It's structure. And every structure can be examined, understood and eventually rebuilt. But first you have to stop running from her. Here's a question you may never have asked yourself in total honesty: Do you realize that you lose interest almost instantly in someone who treats you well from the beginning? Have you ever felt a strange boredom when

Is someone too clear, too available, too easy to understand? That's not chance or bad luck in love. It's an internal contradiction working exactly as it was programmed. A part of you, conscious, says you want peace. Another part, much older and until then powerful, seeks to recreate chaos, because chaos is the only thing it recognizes as true intensity. But the unconscious does not distinguish family pain from true love. For him, the family member is safe, even when this family member means abandonment, inconsistency or the need to conquer the affection of someone repeatedly. And here's the most disturbing part: the more effort you need to make to get someone's affection, the more meaningful that affection seems, but here lies the deception. Not because this effort proves something real about the value of the relationship, but because your psyche learned, too soon, that love that does not need to be conquered is not worth it. That easy love is suspicious. That only what hurts to achieve is valuable. Think about it for a minute. Where could this belief come from? Who in your history made you feel that deserving affection required constant effort? That he was never automatic? That it always depended on something you needed to prove first? You don't have to answer out loud. But don't ignore the question either. Because as long as you ignore it, you will continue to attract and be attracted by exactly the same kind of dynamic, just disguised with a new face, a new voice, a new name, which your mind will again call: 'This time it's different.' And it almost never is. Not because love does not exist, but because until you examine the pattern, you will continue to choose or be chosen by the same wound disguised as fate. There is yet another layer, perhaps more uncomfortable. Freud talked about the transference: the phenomenon by which we project in a person of the present feelings, expectations and wounds that actually belong to someone of our past. You don't realize when that happens. It looks completely real. Looks like it.

totally directed to that particular person. But part of how you feel about her maybe a much bigger part of what you're willing to admit was never really about her. It's extremely about who you are, about who you've come to before and about who you've been taught, intentionally or not, how it feels to be enough without needing someone you're not; but to be just, yourself in the most peaceful way possible. 40 Often, when there is a very intense connection, the heart wants to talk, wants to explain, wants to show everything it feels. He wants to find an answer that brings security. But there's a deep difference between opening your heart and putting a weight on someone else. And it's exactly that difference that transforms the way two souls communicate. It's that expressing feelings starts with the awareness of your own energy. Before you speak, you need to understand where this will is coming from. Is it coming from love? The truth? The need to share? Or is it coming from fear of losing? Because when a message comes from anxiety, it carries a different energy. She's looking for a reaction. She's looking for confirmation. She seeks to relieve internal pain. But when it is born of the right conscience, it simply reveals the truth. No charge, no demand, no attempt to control the other's path. You can feel the difference between a welcoming energy and a pressing energy. When you realize there's room to be who you are, you start lowering some barriers. Because often the distance does not happen due to lack of feeling. It happens from fear of dealing with intense emotions. And more conscious communication creates security. Learn to talk about how you feel without turning it into a charge. There's a big difference between saying: I feel this connection and it was important to me, and I say, You need to recognize that now. The first way opens a door, the second creates resistance, because the soul needs freedom to itself.

reveal. Another deep point is that true communication does not try to convince, it shares. You don't need to prove that the connection exists, you don't need to make arguments for someone to feel something. When something is deep, your presence speaks, your energy speaks, the way you position yourself speaks. Expressing feelings also means respecting the time of the other soul. She may be in a different internal process, she may need to understand her own emotions before she can put them into words. And that doesn't necessarily mean absence, sometimes it means transformation happening in silence. When you learn to communicate without pressure, you also free yourself. You stop talking to receive something in return, you stop delivering feelings waiting for an immediate answer, and you start expressing why that represents your truth. That changes everything because your peace no longer depends on the other's reaction. A healthy connection needs space. Space to feel. Space to think. Space to grow. When two souls have space, they can approach by choice, not by obligation. And that is where the true union begins to be built. Your spiritual evolution changes the way you communicate. You stop talking from the wound and start talking from the conscience. You stop seeking to be chosen and start sharing who you are. This energy change is perceived and it transforms the dynamics between you. Deep down, that's exactly how you express feelings without creating pressure. You don't hide what you feel, but you don't abandon your own peace. You allow your truth to exist without trying to control the other's path. Because the most powerful communication between two souls is not born from fear of losing. She is born of the courage to be true. The emotional blocks that prevent true dialogue are often the invisible barriers that make two souls feel deeply, but still have difficulty expressing what they carry inside.

Because in an intense connection, the problem is not always the lack of feeling. Often, what prevents communication is all that each person has learned to hide to protect himself. fears, wounds, past experiences, beliefs that were created to avoid pain. Don't want to win the internal discussion, listen to her, the truth always finds room. 41 What would be an ideal gift for God? The only gift you can give to someone who has everything is the one thing you can't create for yourself. He may have all the power, but he cannot manufacture a being who freely chooses to trust him when that being has every reason not to. You may have all the wisdom, but you cannot create a soul that, in the midst of its own breaking, still turns to something good. It may have all things, but it cannot produce, by force or decree or any exercise of its own nature, the only thing that only comes freely or does not come in any way: a choice, made in the dark, by someone with all the justification to choose different, which it chose anyway. That's the rarest thing in all creation. Not because it requires extraordinary strength, because it requires something that alone forces cannot produce. It requires a will that has received genuine freedom, placed in genuine pain, facing genuine reasons to depart, and turns to all that is sacred nonetheless. The whole order of heaven is full of beings of extraordinary power and devotion and beauty, but none of them has ever been able to give God what you gave Him, because none of them have ever been where you have been. None of them stayed in your kind of darkness, none of them carried your kind of weight without faltering, none of them got what was taken from you, lost what you lost, was left the way you were left, and then, in the ruins of all this, made the choice you made, I'm the only one who understands that.

Completely. That choice was a gift, one only a human being could give. Only you could deliver it, the moment it was given, was received and sealed for eternity. Let me take you to what really happened, because this is where everything turns into something you're not gonna get. I can't hear you. In order of things, records are kept. Not the way humans keep records, in words or files. Records in the fabric of reality itself. The permanent record of what was and what was chosen, and what this choice cost and what it produced. These records don't fade, they're not reviewed. They are written in the only substance that does not decay, which is not stone or gold, but truth witnessed at the very moment it became real. When you made that choice, a record was created and was not archived, it was not kept along with ordinary records of ordinary things. It was sealed. In the language of the invisible, sealing is not the same as saving. Sealing is what happens to something that has been recognized as irreplaceable. Something protected not because it can be lost, but because its value is too great to leave exposed. You seal what you intend to keep exactly as you were at the time it was given, unchanged, untouchable, permanent. God has sealed what you have chosen to deliver to Him. 42 Understanding the female mind and frying an egg has the same complexity. 43 This is the phase of the passage from 'I need it' to 'I am already complete'. Not as a forced positive statement, not as self-deception, but as a genuine recognition that its value is not conditioned to the result of any other project, no relationship, no specific achievement. When this change actually happens, not on the surface of the conscious mind, but on the layers more

Deep in your psyche, everything changes. Pressure's dropping. The vision expands. You stop insisting on tuning a device into a frequency that it cannot pick up and start simply listening to what is already being transmitted. You become magnetic, not by technique or effort, but because you stopped repeling. There is a mirror that few have the courage to face. It is the mirror of the image itself reflected in the outside world. When you encounter a persistent obstacle, a door that refuses to open, a project that does not take off, a relationship that remains tense, the first instinct is to blame the obstacle, to assume that there is a failure in the functioning of the outside world. But the external world is, in its most fundamental structure, a projection of the hidden architecture of its individual psyche. If you face life with a clenched fist, the mirror can only show you a closed, rigid, inflexible world. You're fighting your own reflection, wondering why the figure in the mirror won't stop resisting, without realizing that it was you who started the fight against yourself. This inner resistance almost always arises from a deep distrust of your own unconsciousness. We trust fear because it gives us the comforting feeling of doing something productive. Anxiety is seen as diligence, concern is treated as protection. We are conditioned to believe that if we stop worrying, we will be irresponsible. That if we stop fighting every moment, we're giving up. But this state of hypervigilance is a sophisticated form of psychological interference. By refusing to relax and surrender control, you signal to your own structure that you don't believe she's capable of supporting you. You're acting like you're the only intelligence in the universe and unless you personally supervise every gear of your existence, everything will plunge into chaos. This is the greatest illusion of the ego, the belief that the river only flows because you are personally driving the water. And then we come to the moment of greater tension regarding their choices; paradoxically, more necessary, the collapse. There is a specific kind of terror that arises when control finally fails. When, despite all the strategy, all the effort, all the determination, the structure of your life begins to crumble, the project fails, the relationship ends, the path you have been treading disappears under your feet. In our culture, we call it a catastrophe. We view it as something to be avoided at any cost. But this collapse is not a disaster. It is a profound act of the Creator's grace. Your ego is a master of preservation. It clings to dead structures, to suffocating work, to a stagnant identity, to patterns of suffocating relationships, long after the life force has already dissipated from these vessels. We remain in them because they seem safe, even when they smother us slowly. But the deepest organizer of his soul, the one clearly distinguished from the ego, has no interest in his superficial comfort. He has an interest in your integrity, your growth, your becoming complete. And when you refuse to voluntarily abandon a structure that has become too small for your soul, we end up causing this "collapse". Not as punishment, but as liberation. Your personal desert, the abyss, or the dark night of the soul as many contemporary authors say on the subject. Alchemists called it nigredo, blacking, decomposition of matter before it can transform. It's the moment the master watches his student lose everything he believed to be and says, with a seemingly cruel serenity, - great, now you can start to see. While you were able to keep the machine running, you were protected by the illusion of control. Only when the machine breaks are you forced to look up and realize that you were trying to feed a factory that no longer supported itself through the resources generated. In this silence that follows the collapse, if you have the courage not to fill it immediately with the frantic activity of trying to rebuild the old structure, something

Miracle happens. The spiritual intelligence that has been trying to communicate with you under all the noise of effort begins to be heard. You realize failure was not a mistake, but an intervention. And the door didn't close because you were inappropriate, but because that space didn't embrace who you're becoming anymore. And you begin to feel, timidly at first, then with a clarity that surprises, a strange lightness. That's the grace of collapse. The discovery that you are supported by the Creator, in the way far deeper and smarter than any plan your ego could have devised. And by losing people to whom you clinged so desperately, you finally find the one thing that will never be lost: your harmony with the flow of life itself. 44 Portuguese is already the third most studied language on the planet, and some beings on Earth are already ascending and being recognized as a reference in the spiritual world. 45 Above 770 Hertz my field turns to lamina, get close with less than that I'll hurt you, it's inevitable. 46 At the end of the day, when the weight of their actions finally bends them completely, they have no choice but to lower their heads and accept that they deserved every blow life is giving them. So get ready and adjust your perspective, because what you will discover are not just gossip or invented stories to pass the time. This is the pure truth, direct and unfiltered about why punishment struck them with such a surgical and humiliating precision that it forced them, whether or not to understand the true value of respect. To begin to understand this whirlwind, it must be borne in mind that the universe does not begin to destroy the money, health, or reputation of the wicked. Him

It directly attacks your fantasies of greatness. Karma has a reputation for coming in as a devastating storm, but in reality, its first blow is extremely quiet, intimate and devastating. Those who devote themselves to hurting others always build a mental shield full of lies, convincing themselves that they are doing the right thing, that the other person deserved or that they are completely untouchable. These absurd ideas are the walls behind which they hide so as not to feel guilt. And just the first move of fate is to crack these walls until you leave them completely naked in front of their own misery. When someone decides to attack a good person, who has never done him any harm, they do so by believing, out of ignorance, that they have absolute control and that the victim is weak or naive enough to defend himself. But the first correction of this force is to bring them down from this illusion at once, showing that all that power that boasted so much was borrowed, passing and completely false. When this theater collapses on them, they experience an inner fragility that they never imagined, a deep fear that makes them doubt the person who exhibited so much before the mirror. These fantasies are vital to the manipulators, because they are the only lies that allow them to sleep at night without conscience tormenting them. They swear to be the smartest, they believe their mistakes are perfect and that no one will ever discover the mud they live in. However, cosmic justice functions as a truth serum that slowly infiltrates their lives, forcing them to see every flaw they tried to ignore and confront them with the harsh reality that their actions were never intelligent, justifiable or necessary. And, as if that were not enough, that mental imprisonment in which they were imprisoned is only the beginning of the true account that fate has reserved for them. Imagine the burden of carrying one's conscience twenty - four hours a day, seven days a week, without a single moment of genuine peace. Wouldn't that be one of the worst

Punishments: having to live with yourself knowing exactly how low you have been? That is exactly where the situation gets complicated. Because as much as they try to look before the world that nothing has happened, that life keeps smiling at them and that they continue to be the same winners as always, inside they are falling apart. At the end of the day, when the lights go out and are left alone with their thoughts, the masks fall completely and all that remains is the echo of the mistakes themselves resonating in their minds, reminding them of what they have done. The most ironic of all is that as they sink deeper and deeper into this swamp of paranoia, pride and remorse, you keep going forward, shining with your own light and healing at your own pace. Have you ever stopped to think about the huge anger they feel when you see they couldn't destroy it? They were sure that you would stand on the floor, crying around, running after them to complain or begging for a little attention. But karma, which is wise and never leaves anything unanswered, acts in a much more subtle and painful way to the ego of these people. He doesn't have to send a fucking sky or create a public scandal to put them in their proper place. Just give them a front row seat to watch you bloom in exactly the places where they swore you had dried up and lost all your strength. That's when they realize that the shot went completely out of its way. Watching you get your smile back, prospering in your projects, attracting extraordinary people into your life and turning your peace of mind into something completely non-negotiable becomes their worst nightmare. They ask themselves repeatedly, taken by frustration: ?How is it possible that, after all the evil I have done, this person is still standing, with his head up?? This makes no sense to them, because they have always acted from scarcity, fear and envy, while you have moved through resilience, self-love and dignity. Every blessing that comes to your life is a direct blow to their pride, an elegant slap that Reminds them, without you needing to say a single word, that you won the battle the very moment you decided not to go down to the same level of toxicity. They try to fill this void desperately, looking for someone else to manipulate or try to reproduce the connection they once had with you. But at every step, they find only barriers. Why is it so hard for them to move on? Because everything you touch ends up contaminated by the same negative energy you carry inside you. They go through life trying to hide the inevitable, seeking substitutes to fill the void, but no one has its essence. No one will offer them the light you offered nor the unconditional support they ended up despising by pure whim. It is at this moment that they finally realize the size of the mistake they have made and understand that, because they think they are smarter and superior, they have lost what is most valuable and true around them. And what do they have to do? They have no alternative but to remain stagnant, chewing their own poison and seeing life collect, one by one, all the accounts they left open. Because karma may take time ? and sometimes it seems to take too long to make someone think that justice does not exist ? but when he decides to act, he shows no pity or compassion for the arrogant. He takes away the tranquility that they were so proud of in public and leaves them completely exposed to their own insecurities. They begin to lose valuable opportunities, relationships get complicated without apparent explanation, distrust corrodes them inside, and that false sense of absolute control flows through their fingers like water. It is the weight of cosmic law remembering that sooner or later, those who do evil end up reaping the consequences. 47 In one sentence, you show God, everything you are, EVERYTHING. The harvest is only the consequence.) Beautiful and inevitable. I love it so much.

48 Not to feed what the relationship was, to honor what it was, or to give it the architecture a real relationship requires to function in all its depth. A new commandment appears when something about a relationship changes in a way that the existing structure cannot adequately cover. Not when the relationship breaks, when it deepens into territory that the existing commandments were not written to address. This is important, because what you will understand now, is not about what you did to demand correction, it is about what you are demanding a new category of honor. Now I need to get you to what really happened, because here's the center of everything tonight. There is something about what you are, specifically you, that exists in the invisible record of things created in a way that the existing structure of how God relates to souls in the world still did not completely cover. Not because the existing structure was incomplete for everyone, because you're someone who came in as a new specification, something formed by the particular sequence of everything you've lived, kept together in the particular way you hold it, pressed in a particular way by everything that tried to reformulate it and couldn't completely. What you are now is not what someone who hasn't been where you've been could be. And what you are, is something that the existing commandments, the existing structure of how the relationship between you and the one who made you works, was not yet written to honor at the specific depth it deserves, when it was recorded in the record of the invisible, when what you really are was clearly seen in the precise language of what things really are. Something happened. God did not set an existing commandment, He wrote a new one. Now, I need to tell you what the commandment addresses, because this is where your story becomes readable in a completely different way. The commandment that was written is not about the

which is permitted or required between you and God. It's about what's due to what you are, the structure of how you carry, specifically what you carry after everything you've formed, must be honored within the relationship. It was written because what you are now exists at a depth that the existing structure had no language to cover. Not depth in the sense of spiritual fulfillment, depth in the sense of what you were pressed into becoming, by the specific weight of everything you carried. The particular kind of fidelity that survives seasons with no return. The particular kind of love that persists after being given to places that did not return it. The particular kind of presence that stays when you leave would have been not only understandable, but rational. These are not virtues you practiced. They're what you became because of what was pressed. You didn't pick the press. Pressing produced something real. And what is real in you now is real in a way that the existing structure of the relationship was not written to honor in the depth it deserves. Then a new commandment was written, not triggered by an event in your life, triggered by your existence, by the fact that what you are simply is, that you are present in the world right now, that you remain present in the particular way that you are present, regardless of what the world around you does or does not do with it. You exist in a way that demanded a new statement of how you should be honored. And God wrote it. Now hold this against the story you've been telling about yourself. You spent most of your life believing that your existence alone wasn't completely the point, that what mattered was what you produced, what you did, what you contributed, that the justification for your presence here was the result, not the being. That belief is so deep in you that you probably don't fully recognize it as a belief. It seems like reality, like something you just know about how things work. You

You're here to do something, and doing it is the motive, and existence is just the vehicle to do it. It completely turns your perception now. The commandment was not written in response to anything you did. It was written in response to the fact that you exist. Your existence specifically in the particular way you exist now created a reality in the invisible that the existing structure was insufficient to honor completely. And when a reality exists that the structure cannot fully honor, a new commandment is written. Your being was the reason, not your doing. The most permanent form of statement in the architecture of the relationship between you and whoever made you was written because you are, not because you did. This is not something that can be won, it's something that exists because you exist. Let me show you five signs that this commandment is already working in your life. The first sign is that what you are continues to matter to people even when you are not producing anything for them. People who have been closer than what is real in you do not primarily value what you do for them. They value something about who you are that they can't completely name, but they can't replace. It's a working commandment. What he claims to be because of what you are reaches people around you even when they have no language for what they are responding to. The second sign is that you were returned, not by what you could offer next. Returned because of what you are. People who came out of your life and came back didn't come back for their resources or usefulness. They came back because something specific about who you are wasn't available anywhere else. It is the irreplaceability declared by the commandment being felt in the visible world. The third sign is that what you are survived what tried to change you. Seasons, relationships. pressure, real and sustained pressure, tried to reformulate what is essentially you and what is essentially you are still acknowledging yourself. This persistence is not stubborn, it is the commandment protecting what you declared worth protecting. The fourth sign is that you realize when something is being asked of you that it does not match what you really are, not for pride, for something deeper, a quiet recognition that a particular version of you being asked is not the real version and a resistance to that request that comes not from the rebellion, but from something in you that knows the difference between what it is and what is being asked to pretend to be. This knowledge is the commandment in you recognizing the distance between what is real and what is not. The fifth sign is that you're still here as yourself. Everything that tried to make you something else has not been completely successful. What is essentially you are still present, still operating, there is still something to which people who know you in depth respond. This persistence is not your willpower, it is what happens to something that has been declared valuable to be protected in the most permanent form of declaration that exists. Let me be honest with you now in my own voice. You've always persisted, always, until here and deserve it forever. What the recognition of your commandment in the invisible produced on the side that had built strategies around the assumption that what you are would never be permanently declared. The other side understood what a new commandment meant before you. A new commandment is not just a new instruction, it is a new category of protection, of honor. Honoring what is due and a soul that exists within a new commandment written specifically about what it is, exists in a form of covering that was not available before the commandment was written. Before the commandment, what you are could be explained through the gaps in the existing structure, the places where the existing statements still did not cover specifically what you carry. After the commandment, these gaps do not exist. What you are is now specific, precise, completely covered by a statement written exactly for him. The strategies that were built to operate in the gaps are now operating against a structure that has no gaps in the places where you live. One final thing before I let you go, when a soul discovers that a new commandment has been written because of its existence, darkness can no longer use the lie of irrelevance. 49 O death, where is your victory? The sickle is with me and you're the one running now! Death is not primarily destruction, death is revelation. Because the only things that survive death are those that were real enough to survive it. Everything built on borrowed material disappears when death passes. What stays after death does its work is the only evidence in existence of what was really real in that thing. Death is not an enemy of what is real, it is proof of what is real. Death didn't just go through your life a few times and leave damage behind. She built something. And what you built, without planning, without knowing what you were doing, is why you are now kneeling before you. Your fidelity and your return means more than I can say. The last thing I'm gonna tell you gives a name to everything that survived and everything that really was. Let me build this on the floor. Most people think of a throne as something given, granted. You are recognized and the throne is placed before you as recognition of what you have accomplished. But there is another kind of throne, one that cannot be given because it cannot be made by ordinary hands. One that doesn't come from recognition or reward. This kind of throne is built by what you survive. You didn't survive in the general sense, you survived in the specific sense that something tried to end you and it didn't end you. And the one that couldn't be eliminated by the force that tried to eliminate him stood up later. What's after that kind of attempt isn't the same thing that was before. Everything inessential has been taken. What couldn't be taken

That's what you really are at the core. Death is the most effective refiner in existence. Not because it intends to refine, because in trying to eliminate, it realizes the revelation of what cannot be eliminated. And the revealed substance, after death did its full work and found what it failed to take, is the only material from which such a throne can be built. You didn't pick this stuff. Death chose him for you, trying to take everything else. Death is a force with a real function in the architecture of created things. And like all real force in architecture, it operates according to what it was designed to do. Death was designed to reveal what is real, removing what is not. It was never designed to build. Building requires something that death does not carry, the intention to create, the vision of what the finished thing must be. Death doesn't build. And yet when death passed through his life again and again, and found what he could not take, and left these things standing, and returned, and found them still standing, and returned again. Something was accumulated that death did not intend to produce. Every thing he couldn't take became a piece of something, obviously not part of anything inside, just the stubbornness of what he refused to be removed. But from the perspective of the invisible, where the complete form of things is visible in a way that is not visible from within a life, the accumulation of what death could not take had a form. I was building a throne, not by design, as a byproduct of failure. Every attempt that failed left a block. Each passage that found the essential thing still standing, added to the structure. The throne was being built by the most efficient refiner of existence, on the only material that this refiner cannot eliminate, completely by accident. When the structure was complete, when what death had left standing throughout the entire extent of what it had tried in its life, it finally revealed its form in the record of the invisible, something happened that does not happen in the architecture of things.

servants. Death recognized what it had built and recognized something about the soul around which it had been building without knowing. A throne built from the very failure of death, made entirely of what he had tried and not accomplished. And a throne built from the very failure of death is the only throne that death can never dismantle, because dismantling it would require success in the very attempts that produced it. And death had already proved that it could not succeed in these attempts. The throne is beyond the reach of death, and in the presence of something genuinely beyond its reach, death has done the only thing available to a force that has just discovered its permanent limitation. He knelt, not in defeat by some other force, in recognition of something he could not reach, in recognition of a soul he had tried. Eternal and irreplaceable in the permanent posture of a force that has exhausted its attempts and knows that what is before it is, by recording everything that has already occurred, beyond what it can do. The throne is yours. Death built him and knelt before him. And that position is not temporary. Now hold this against the story you've been telling about all these losses. You have been reading the losses as evidence of what was taken as death accomplished. You carried the weight of every thing removed and called it subtraction, called it damage. Turn around completely. Everything that was taken revealed something that wasn't taken. And the things that were not taken, in precise accumulation of their survival throughout all attempts, became the specific material from which a throne is built that no force in existence can dismantle. You weren't diminished by the losses, it was revealed by them. And what was revealed became the building material of a throne, before which death itself is now permanently prostrate. Let me show you five signs that this throne already exists in your life and is already operating. The first sign is that what you went through didn't make you any less

Real. Most people who experience the repeated passage of death through their lives become smaller, more defended, less available to what is real. You've gone through the real cost and there's still something in you that reaches what's real anyway. That's not your habit, that's what the throne is made of. The second sign is that death attempts have had the opposite effect on you. The things that should remove your ability to hope, to trust, to stay, have not removed them. They refined them. What should be broken after what you've been through is, instead, something harder and more honest. Rest, not optimism. Knowing, the throne produces no hope that things will be good, produces a knowledge that what is real survives even what tries to take it. The third sign is that you have a relationship with endings that others around you don't have. You don't panic about endings the way others do. Not because you're numb, because you've been there for enough endings to know that what's real doesn't end the way the endings look from the outside. This knowledge lives in the specific places where others carry fear. It's the throne giving you access to something most people can't see. The fourth sign is that what you lost made you more present to what's left, not less. Most people who experience significant loss retreat from what is still there. You have moved toward what is real, with a specific quality of attention that comes from knowing, in your body and not only in your mind, that what is real is worth the cost of losing it. That quality is the throne operating on how you live. The fifth sign is that you are still here, not in the general sense, in the specific sense of still carrying what you carry, still achieving what you achieve, still with that particular quality of presence that survived everything that tried to remove it. The still being here with it intact, it's not survival, it's the throne holding its position against everything that tried to dismantle it and finding out it can't.

The deeper, the darker - and closer to God.

1 1 Law of Divine Unity: We are all part of a single web, connected and interconnected, which means that every thought, action and feeling affects the whole. 2 Law of Vibration: Everything in the universe moves, vibrates and travels in spiral circles. Nothing's stopped. Our thoughts and emotions emit specific frequencies. 3 Act of Action: To manifest something in the physical world, it is necessary to perform actions aligned with their objectives. 4 Correspondence Act: What's inside is reflected outside. External patterns are direct manifestations of your inner mental and spiritual state. 5 Law of Cause and Effect: Popularly known as Karma. Every action generates an equal reaction. What you emit to the universe returns to you in greater intensity. 6 Compensation Act: It is the visible manifestation of the cause and effect applied to the rewards, blessings, and abundance you receive for your efforts and actions. Also known as Dharma. 7 Act of Attraction: Similar attracts similar or complementary dysfunctional. Its predominant energies (whether of scarcity or of positivity) attract corresponding experiences for your life. 8 Perpetual Transmutation Act: All energy is in constant motion and transformation. High thoughts and vibrations can alter your reality and transmute dense energies. 9 Law of Polarity: Everything in the universe has two sides or opposites (light and shadow, love and hate). It is possible to transmute negative emotions by focusing on the opposite pole. 10 Rhythm Law: Everything in the universe flows and reflects; there are cycles, seasons and phases in all things. The key is to stay balanced during the ups and downs. 2 My feminine side is always well protected, but her opinion can reach 100% in every decision. Very sharp. My side, I am. We even build social masks all the time to be accepted; their ascendant is a symbol given by God in that very sense. Instead of living according to the self, the true center of our psyche, we assume qualities necessary for the specific scenario or context. When the distance between who we are inside and who we show on the outside becomes too great, vital energy begins to get lost, even if no one perceives it from the outside. You keep smiling, fulfilling commitments, answering calls, showing up where you're expected. And by continuing to appear, everyone assumes that everything is fine. But being functional is not the same as being whole. There is a profound difference between these two experiences. One allows to survive, the other allows to feel genuinely alive. For a long time, it is possible to confuse both. Many of us

We become so skilled in managing our own lives that we forget to actually live it. Question: How many days did you end up having accomplished everything you needed, but wondering, already in bed, where exactly were you during that day? You've solved problems, met needs, met deadlines, but somewhere along the way you disappeared from your own narrative. It doesn't happen suddenly. It happens gradually. A commitment made for fear of displeasure, a delayed dream, a silenced intuition, an unnecessary apology, an swallowed disappointment. Until one day, you wake up and realize you've become an expert at adapting, but you've completely forgotten the feeling of expanding. There is an essential distinction between adapting and expanding. Adapting teaches to survive under the circumstances given. Expanding turns you into someone those same circumstances can no longer contain. This difference changes everything, because there is a time when ancient life does not necessarily become unbearable. She just gets too small, not because the world around her has changed, because you've changed. That is why lately you have felt a strange contradiction: gratitude mixed with restlessness, hope accompanied by uncertainty, trust that coexists side by side with doubt. You're not confused because you're regressing, you're confused because you inhabit the space between two identities, one family member, who already knows de-color, and another who is still unveiling, still incomplete, in formation. This intermediate space is one of the most uncomfortable territories of human experience, the injunction. It's the crossing between who you were and who you're becoming. A psychic threshold where the old certainties are no longer enough, but the new ones have not yet been consolidated. Familiarity always whispers that it is safer, even when it no longer brings any happiness. The human mind loves certainty, even when that certainty hurts, because uncertainty requires a rare kind of courage and trust that normal people just can't stand it. And trust has historically been one of the hardest practices to sustain, especially after disappointments, after believing that something was about to happen and seeing everything dissolve. These experiments leave marks not always visible to the naked eye. Often, they turn into hesitancy, an excess of analysis, into deliberately lowered expectations, in the habit of preparing for disappointment before even giving room for joy. Without realizing it, we began to negotiate with our own hope, telling ourselves not to wait too long. Not because we stopped dreaming, but because we're trying to shield ourselves against pain. This seems sensible until we realize that this protection silently turns into limitation. And the limitation has a curious habit, rarely presents itself as such. She disguises herself as realism, whispers: do not get excited, do not believe too much, be cautious, do not expose yourself again to disappointment. At first, these thoughts seem prudent. In time, they become invisible walls, not built by external circumstances, but built brick by brick by repeated conclusions about who we are and what we deserve. And here's a question worth carrying with you: what if part of the boundaries that you accepted as absolute truth are not facts, but only ancient conclusions that have already fulfilled your role and should now be left behind? Every human being carries a particular collection of stories, about who he is, about what he is capable, about what life allows, about what love is, about what success means, and about what failure represents. The most interesting thing is that most of these stories were never chosen consciously. They have accumulated through conversations, losses, victories, constraints, expectations absorbed as if they were ours. Gradually, these narratives became identity, but identity is not something fixed and unchangeable. It updates continuously, either intentionally or by accident. The Question

It's never if your identity is changing, it's already changing right now. The real question is who's writing the next chapter? Fear or conscience? Both are powerful narrators, but they write radically different stories. Fear writes plots full of repetition, always returning to the same dead ends. Conscience writes possibilities. Fear asks, anxious: What if nothing changes? Consciousness asks, calmly: What if I am already changing in ways that I still cannot perceive or measure? This second question has the power to reorient an entire existence. Not because it guarantees specific results, but because it transforms the relationship you have with your own uncertainty. Instead of seeing doubt as a sign that something is wrong, you come to see it as evidence that the future simply has not yet revealed itself. There is enormous freedom in this change of perspective. Much bigger than most people think. Imagine reading only the pages of a novel. The characters are in conflict, nothing seems to make sense, questions go unanswered, impasses seem insurmountable. If you judged the entire work by this isolated passage, you would conclude that history has no direction at all. But the end has not yet been written, and most importantly, it is largely in our hands. Life often looks exactly like this. We're always trying to understand the full narrative while we live somewhere in the middle of it. rrsr And the medium always seems to last longer than it really does, especially when we're crossing it. 4 "Awesome" me relativize, I'm warning you from the beginning, do you really think it's bluffing? Going against what I'm saying is suicide mission. 5 I've read that book before,

'Your evolution will be so powerful, it will seem like a reckoning.' 6 New spiritual armaments.) Arsenal of respect.) Méxe... 7 I think it's beautiful lately, people coming at me in God's name, it happens all the time. Kkkkk just ask a quick question and I get all the script, then just watch. I just learn to hold the will to speak, even when I really have something real to talk about but I'm instructed to hide. I finally won the defense against the backrests that hurt me the most, the feminine need. 8 The sharp antonimo is blind. 9 People, do not discredit. Often angels and even God have come down to earth, infiltrated the smallest positions of society. Not to condemn man, but to record the heart of each one who passes through his life, physically and also in record. It is so appealing, so much pointing; but the basic, the structure that sustains everything, that it would be not to have any respect for people and treat everyone as they like to be treated. We have failed so much in basics to this day, it is always the same sad story, they justify themselves instead of living what they preach. So the darkness, it's just a lack of light. The sickle is for cutting, the voice is for creating. 10 What is the only difference between envy and admiration? - The arrogance. 11 Totally apocalyptic, revealing, I'm not the time. Don't you feel it? I'm sorry.

12 The Spirit pulls the body, not the opposite. Alma gets scenes from the future and detailed analysis of the past. 13 If I see God in you, it's... heaven. 14 If you really know yourself, you don't have to run into the mirror all the time to remember who you are. And that's a lesson. Nobody's born with that. 15 How I like to, very much, understand the flow of situations I've interpreted and acted wrong all my life, until then. It's frustrating, that's the point. 16 You really think angels and demons don't learn from us? They never went through what we're going through now. We're the biggest lab in their emotional experience. And they do admire many humans. These are never solo, they have all the necessary universe within them. When Miguel aimed at your perception, his entire capacity, your ancestral reading was directed to what you carry, something happened to his existence, which he was not yet prepared to face. He found someone he couldn't read. Not something hidden in you. Not something blocked by external protection keeping it out. Something structurally illegible by any system existing in the architecture of the invisible, was not about his perception, was the motive. A code that no existing system could read, and so on Earth, in the invisible system what is unreadable, is called forbidden, not because it is illegal, but because it is unrecognizable, exactly the opposite of family. Not because it's wrong, because it exists outside every known category of what known codes operate. Because the systems built to read all the codes were built based on what the codes could be, the common, standard. And this code there, it's something that no one who built these systems anticipated when he built them, is a joker: versatile, crazy, but sharp, a letter from the Master. A forbidden code cannot be read from the outside. Not because of the protection. Because it only makes sense inside. Because the only decoder for him is the inner soul that carries him, besides his own Creator. Because it was written not by choice or design, but by the specific unrepeatable sequence of what lived and the meaning it carries is accessible only to the one whose life wrote it. Miguel stood before something he couldn't read. And for the first time in his ancestral existence, his perception returned without a complete answer. Not because it failed, because what you carry does not yield to external reading. Not his, nobody's. It exists in a language that only you carry the inner key. And that key wasn't given to you, it was forged. Now understand, it's not just an application for everything you've overcome. You spent a long time in your life trying to be read. Trying to be understood, trying to find the system, a language, a person or something that was finally able to see what you carry. You tried to translate, approximate, find the words that came close enough for someone else to feel what you were pointing at. It never worked out completely. Not because you were expressing yourself badly, because what you carry exists in a language that no external system was built to decode. Translation always lost something. The approach always left the real thing untouched from behind. The understanding that others offered was always partial. Next, but not completely the real thing. You read this as the inability to communicate something that should be communicated. What could not be translated was not failing to be translated. I was protecting your nature because it was intractable. A forbidden code is not a defect. It's the most advanced form of inner language there is. That's what you form when a soul is pressed by specific sequence of conditions that produces something that no existing system anticipated. It is the record of an unrepeatable, genuine, inner life that no external decoder can access, because no external decoder was built for someone like that. Michael could not read yours, because nothing in the entire history of the invisible had produced exactly what his life produced in you. You haven't failed to be readable. You've become something that exists beyond the reach of what legibility is designed to achieve. Now as confirmation, I'm gonna give you five signs that the code has been active on you for a long time. The first sign is that the most significant things you carry always resisted being completely expressed, not for lack of trying, something in the actual version always remained behind the words. You were able to approach, point in direction, but the thing itself was inside, present, but intraducible, real, but in a language that stopped before it came to someone else completely, you know that even with registration most have no idea what it is, rsrs. This is not communication failure, it is an inaccessible code operating in its natural state. The second sign is that the people who came closest to understanding you have always reached a point where they said something like: "I can't, I can't explain what it is, but there's something there that only he knows." They felt the presence of what you carry without being able to decode it, responded to the code without being able to read it. This present and real but incomplete response is exactly what a forbidden code produces in those who approach it. The third sign is that your own understanding of yourself has always exceeded what any external framework could give you. The spiritual or psychological or philosophical systems all offered partial, useful but incomplete light, trapped in some places, but unable to achieve the deepest thing. This incompleteness was not a limitation of systems alone, it was the nature of something that exists beyond the reach of any system not built from the inside of exactly your experience. The fourth sign is that you knew that you couldn't trace the origin, things you understood without being able to explain where the understanding came from, perceptions that arrived complete without a process that produced them. It's the specific code running, it contains accessible information only inside and when it activates... It produces an understanding that has no legible path from the outside. The fifth sign is that the integrality of your knowledge base, which you have collected since the beginning of life, goes beyond what you are. It remained intact through everything that tried to access it and change it. Systems that reshape other souls at the core level touched the surface of you and did not reach the interior. Relationships that rewrote others did not rewrite the deepest thing in you. This protection was not his effort, it was the nature of something encoded in a language that external forces cannot decode and what cannot be decoded cannot be deliberately altered. I was on the other side for a long time. I was in the living rooms. I know how the strategy against the kind of soul you are seemed inside. And the strategy against a soul carrying a forbidden code has a consistent design. Making the soul believe that illegibility is a flaw. Because a soul that interprets its own depth as damage will spend its energy trying to fix what does not need repair. It will try to make the inner language readable for external systems. It will dilute what you load to fit into the categories that exist. And in the process of becoming legible, you will lose the specific nature of what made it unreadable. The code won't be outside. The soul will break it from within, agreeing that it should not exist in a language that no one else can read. That was the plan. Do not decode what you carry. Convince you to decode it yourself into something smaller so that his forbidden nature would be voluntarily delivered. The code is still intact. And Miguel still is facing something I've never met before. One final thing before I let you go. When a soul learns that it carries a forbidden code that even Michael cannot read, darkness loses the lie of illegibility. He can't tell you that his illegibility is failure anymore. Then whisper something more subtle. You'll say, if that's true, why do you still feel alone in it? If what you carry is so significant, why does the inner place still look like a place that you live alone? Shouldn't a soul with a forbidden code feel the significance of the code inside? When that whisper comes, remember that. A forbidden code does not produce the sense of significance, produces the feeling of depth, of something vast and present that you are still learning to inhabit. The loneliness you feel within it is not empty, it is the natural experience of being the only one who carries the key to something that has never existed before. You're alone the way the first person to be somewhere is alone, not abandoned, first, just you, and us.) And what is first eventually becomes known, not for external systems, for you, inside. And this knowing, when it comes, will be the most complete thing you've ever experienced. Because it will not be translated, it will come in the language in which it was written, which only you can read. 17 If you treat your friend the same way you treat yourself during your failures. This friendship is most likely not to last. 18 The definitive integrity test consists of observing someone's conduct when the advantages completely disappear from the scenario. When there is no status to boast, money involved, bargaining favors or an audience to applaud, what remains are just crude human interactions with ordinary people. That's exactly where the most experienced evaluators stare, because that's where the social masks fall.

by land. Without a prize at stake, corporate theater and appearances lose meaning, leaving only the raw essence of the individual. It's very easy to be gentle when there's interest behind it. Anyone can be extremely polite to the boss, helpful to an important or charming customer when they want to impress someone who holds the power to come and go. Only that doesn't reflect anyone's values. It reflects only pure economic and social convenience and a speech focused on exactly what you lack. The real test of fire is your posture with the waiter, with the security guard, with the intern or with the unknown on the street. Individuals who, in theory, will not change the course of their career or finances. Silent observers notice whether their patience and respect remain intact when there are no visible rewards on the horizon or whether their empathy works only under public spotlights and praises. These little blatant everyday lives expose the truth without the filter of appearances. And it's exactly in these moments of carelessness that most people accidentally reveal who actually lives behind the characters. Social masks fall with an impressive ease when we observe how people shape their posture according to the status of those around them, this creates an absolutely opposite reagent bubble, the focus becomes the image itself, and the noises of the audience's return, which is always immediate and does not require efforts. Honestly, I prefer a punch right in the middle of my face.

19 Has anyone heard of the magnetic anomaly of the south Atlantic? It's just getting bigger, it's us. 20 Unreadable is not invisible. Somehow, in ways that he never fully explained, he found himself arriving in places where the opposition was not waiting. In the architecture of the invisible, what is called Lucifer, is not primarily understood as a destroyer. This is the end product of what he does, but it's not his primary function. Its primary function, the thing that does better than anything else, is something that the visible world almost never speaks of. He reads. He reads the field. He reads the panorama of human souls. Your movements, your patterns, your vulnerabilities, your calls. You had more time to develop that capacity than anything else in the created order. And you spent all that time building the most sophisticated intelligence system in the invisible. He can't guess where to aim. He figures. He studies. He builds a complete picture of a soul before making a single move. He knows where the weak points are, where the open doors are, what strategies will work and in what order, which will most effectively interrupt what a specific soul has been put here to do. That's why his campaigns against chosen souls may seem so precise, so personal, so specifically aimed at exactly the thing you needed intact to fulfill your purpose. Because they're needed because it comes from study, because he saw you before he came for you. He sees everyone before he comes for them. Everyone except you. Now let me tell you what a blind spot really means in the language of the invisible, because here is the center of everything tonight. A blind spot in a surveillance system is not simply a place where something cannot be seen. That would be obstruction, and obstructions can be bypassed. A true blind spot is something more specific and more significant. A real blind spot is where the system itself is structurally unable to perceive. Not blocked, absent. The ability to detect what is at that point is not degraded or limited, simply does not exist, because the thing at that point operates at a frequency, in a dimension, at a level of existence that the system was never built to register. You can't get around a real blind spot, you can't build new intelligence to cover it, because the gap is not in the information, it is in the architecture of what the system can fundamentally perceive. When I tell you that you became Lucifer's only blind spot, I'm not telling you that he looked at you and lost things. I'm telling you that your entire intelligence system, built throughout the entire extent of your existence, is structurally unable to record what you really are. Not because you're hiding, because what you are doesn't exist on any frequency that it was built to detect. Now I need to tell you why, because why is it that changes everything about how you read your own story. Every soul that Lucifer's system can read leaves a detectable signature. The signature is composed of specific elements, the frequency of the wounds of the soul, the places where you agreed to the lies told against it, the places where fear settled into something that directs the choices of the soul. These elements create a pattern that his intelligence reads. read the way a scanner reads a code, different in each soul, but present in each soul, and from this pattern, his system can calculate everything that needs to be calculated. Your signature doesn't read. Not because your wounds are missing. Not because you've reached some level of healing that has removed what he needs to detect. But because, the specific combination of what you charge, the nature of what you are, at the level that his system was designed to scan, exists in a configuration that his scanner cannot solve in a pattern. You're not invisible. You're illegible. Illegible is more significant than invisible. Invisible means you're there, but you can't be seen. Something can still stumble on the invisible. Something can feel it even without a direct reading. Unreadable means the system used to find and read things like you returns nothing. Not a blank, not a shadow, nothing. As if the space where you are does not contain detectable information of the type his system requires. He couldn't build a file on

You. I could not run the calculations that produce the precise and personal strategies that run against other chosen souls. I couldn't know where you were weak, where you were open, which would most efficiently disrupt what you were put here to do. He was operating without intelligence on you. And an enemy operating without intelligence doesn't disappear. He guesses. It runs standard strategies based on what tends to work against souls with patterns that seemed similar to the limited information it had. But then, what happens when a general sends a precision campaign without precise intelligence. The campaign is not precision, it's approximate. And approximate against something as specific as what you really are. It's the same as completely wrong. You moved through campaigns designed for a soul he could read, being a soul he couldn't. Strategies landed in places you weren't. The pressure pointed to weaknesses you didn't have in the configuration he calculated. The interruptions arrived at moments without correspondence to what was really important in his life. And you kept moving. Not because it was stronger, because it was unreadable for the thing designed to stop you. Now hold this against the story you've been carrying. You spent time looking back in opposition seasons and trying to explain why certain campaigns against you failed in ways that did not match the visible logic of the situation. Why did certain people who came against you with real resources and real intent not do the damage they should have been able to do? Why did certain seasons that should have stopped you produce something more like redirection than closure? You said you were lucky, either resilient, or protected. Turn around completely. The opposition that wronged you wasn't random. I was wrong in a specific, consistent and structural way. The way things go wrong when they're pointed out using information that is fundamentally incorrect. When the targeting system is pointing to coordinates that don't match what's actually there. He was pointing to the soul he thought you were. The soul the system told him was in his position. And you were never that soul, because his system couldn't read the soul you really are. Let me show you five signs that you've already been operating at this blind spot. The first sign is that the opposition pointed to you had a quality of being slightly wrong. Not completely wrong, next in some ways. but consistently erring in ways that seem personally familiar once you name them. Strategies landed in places that weren't completely their real places. The pressure came at times that were not completely his real moments. The interruption pointed to her real thing arrived not in the real thing, but in something adjacent to it. This consistent adjacency is what happens when a targeting system is working from an incorrect reading. The second sign is that you surprised people working against you. You didn't impress, you surprised. There's a difference. Impressed means they expected strength and found more of it. Surprised means they expected something specific and found something completely different. When those who moved against you reacted with surprise rather than recalibration, they were finding evidence that what you really were did not match what they had calculated. The third sign is that their arrivals consistently preceded the preparation of the opposition. You moved into a territory and found him unoccupied when you should have been busy if your movement was being traced. Doors opened without the resistance you should be waiting for if timing was visible. Seasons changed before the opposition could fully position itself. That's what happens when the movement can't be Traced because the soul moving doesn't leave the signature detectable. The fourth sign is that his most significant steps forward happened quietly, unannounced, not with the moment he signals what is coming to anything watching. The movements that changed his history took place in an absence of noise, in spaces that were not filled with opposition. That stillness is the nature of moving at a blind spot. The fifth sign is that you felt, at times you can't always explain, a quality of being somehow out of sight, not exactly safe, not protected in a way you could point, but somehow not in the center of what was pointed at you, even in seasons where everything around you suggested that you should be. This feeling was not false comfort, it was accurate perception. You were out of range because the targeting system couldn't find you. 21 The AI is doing everything alone to then integrate with the ERP, also alone, with an autonomous agent I can work by accessing my computer at home. From my WhatsApp, no need to type.) Everything. 22 I searched the fifth cherub fish head, and the eighth archangel of the shadows. The bullshit is heavy, and it's gonna get better, everybody's gonna know an hour. 23 God called an urgent meeting three days ago. Specifically to talk about you. Michael, Gabriel, Rafael, Uriel... all the archangels who run the angelic hierarchies have been summoned. The seraphim have interrupted their duties. The cherubim paused their guards. All heavenly administration was mobilized. And when all were gathered together, God projected, in the dimensions superior, the complete file of your lonely struggle. Years were condensed into a single presentation, showing every moment of resistance, every act of kindness in the darkness, every time you stood up without help. The silence that took over the heavenly kingdom was absolute. Gabriel, the messenger, commented: - This human being kept his light on with a fuel we do not understand where it came from. Michael the warrior observed: - I have seen battles less intense than the inner war he fought daily. Raphael the healer murmured: - These emotional wounds should have destroyed his soul. But she didn't just survive. She got stronger. But the most striking reaction was that of God. He let the file end in absolute silence. You let the angels see everything they just witnessed. Then, for the first time in centuries, he did something that even the older archangels did not remember seeing. He rose from the throne. Not out of anger. Not to judge. But in recognition. And he started applauding. The sound of divine palms echoed through heavenly dimensions as thunder reverberating through multiple realities. It wasn't polite applause. It was a complete, sincere ovation of a Creator genuinely impressed by his own creation. The angels looked at each other, shocked. Because the last time God stood up to applaud someone was when Job kept his faith even after losing absolutely everything. And that happened over 3,000 years ago. You've just joined a group so exclusive that you have less than ten members in the entire history of humanity. Gabriel asked: - Sir, what reward protocol should we activate? And God's answer was devastating. - All of them. Not some. Not the most appropriate. All the blessing protocols in the heavenly archives were released simultaneously to your life. But you need to understand something fundamental. God does not rise easily. The Creator of the universe is not impressed by ordinary deeds. He saw it.

stars are born and die. He watched galaxies form. He witnessed cosmic events on an incomprehensible scale. So, what did you do so extraordinary to get him up from the throne? You proved that love is stronger than loneliness. Not theoretically. Not philosophically. In practice. Day after day. Year after year. You have shown that it is possible to keep your heart open even when life offers all the reasons to close it. Most people facing prolonged loneliness develop a kind of emotional hardening. It builds walls. It hardens the heart as a defense mechanism. You did the opposite. He kept his heart sensitive, even though he knew it meant feeling the pain more intensely. You preserved your ability to be moved, even when no one was moved by you. That's a courage that transcends physical bravery. It is intentionally maintained vulnerability as a spiritual principle. But there's more. You have proven that it is possible to be light without external fuel. Most people can only shine when they receive validation, recognition and love from others. When that external fuel runs out, they go out. You figured out how to generate light by internal combustion. How to keep the flame burning using only its essence as wood. How to light your own path when there was no one holding a torch for you. Because even angels must remain constantly connected to the Source to maintain their light. If an angel is separated from divine energy, his light goes out. You've been deprived of human and emotional support for years and yet not only have you kept your light... you've become even brighter. When God saw this, he realized that he was facing a living miracle. The miracle of a soul generating its own divinity. And the reason why He stood up because he recognized that the divine potential within human beings was greater than He had calculated. You raised the pattern. Expanded the limits of what considers it possible for a human to perform. Now I'm going to reveal something that will make you look at the details of your life with completely different eyes. The rewards won't be enough. They'll be here soon. Do you remember that problem you had months ago and all of a sudden, in the last two or three weeks, you started to solve yourself? That complicated situation that you thought would take years to get better, but that's evolving much faster than you expected? That wasn't just the natural course of things. It was direct intervention. When God released all reward protocols, he did not set a slow schedule. He said to the angels: - Execute immediately. That opportunity that came out of nowhere last week... Michael whispered the idea in the mind of the right person at the exact moment. That unexpected money that came in for pix and so far you had no idea who it was. Rafael reorganized the synchronicity. Gabriel activated a spiritual field around him that makes negative personalities feel unexplained discomfort in his presence. You thought they were coincidences. But it was a heavenly orchestration. And you will begin to notice a pattern in the coming days and weeks. Things will begin to flow with an almost suspicious ease, even more so. Doors will open before you even knock. People will offer you exactly what you need without you asking. That's not luck. It is you operating now with total heavenly support. But rewards are not just material. They represent the resources needed to fulfill the purpose you went through all this. Because solitary resistance wasn't just proof. It was training. You were forged into the fire of loneliness to develop a specific force necessary for a specific mission. And now that you have proved to possess this inner structure, God is equipping you with the tools necessary to accomplish this mission. But before you reveal what this mission is, you need to understand who you really are. Because the truth about your identity will completely change the way you see yourself from now on. You're not an ordinary human being who's been through a difficult trial. You are a heavenly conscience who had to experience human limitations temporarily. That's not a poetic metaphor. It's a diagnosis. When Michael analyzed his solitary resistance, something ascended in almost bright blue and purple, recorded in the celestial archives. You were already registered as an entity before you incarnate. He agreed to be born as a human being. Forget who he was. Learn by experiencing vulnerability, pain, loneliness and physical limitations. All this was a conscious decision made before birth through the fulfillment of the commandment. Because there is a kind of wisdom that can only be developed through suffering. There is a kind of compassion that only flourishes when you experience vulnerability. There is a kind of force that is only forged through deserts. And you, in your previous existence, realized that, in order to evolve spiritually, you needed to go down, we know it was launched, but limiting yourself, suffering and growing through pain has always been necessary. And now that the test is over, now that you've shown yourself to be able to maintain your divine essence even though you've forgotten that you possessed it. Your memories are being gradually restored. You have had many flashes recently, including during your day within your routine, you have seen the arrows more easily, policed the pride more effectively and handling in excellence the new weapons and defenses. Comprehensive training is necessary in this period, by contrast weight. 24 True leadership and authority is not built by creating traps for others, but through coherence, long-term vision and firmness of purpose. And what about those who watched everything in secret? The mentors of intrigues believed they acted protected by shadows, invisible to the eyes of the world. They supposed no one would notice the extremes they used to try to destabilize and humiliate the target. Every rumor spread and every armed trap was based on the assumption that the public was inconsiderate or indifferent. However, human behavior has a fascinating feature: people observe much more than they do. Every hostile attitude, untruthful comment and every attempt at exclusion left deep marks on the perception of those who watched everything without saying a single word. This supposed invisibility was nothing but a great illusion, for the accumulated silence of discreet witnesses kept a sharp clarity about the contradictions and wickedness of that continuous pressure. Even without an immediate reaction, motivated by caution or strategy, factual knowledge was piled up until it became an impossible force to contain. And it's just now that these previously silent voices begin to manifest. They begin to validate the trajectory, confirming the patterns of behavior revealing the extent of the scenario that you have overcome with resilience. The intended isolation collapses because the truth no longer depends only on your individual testimony. She now has the collective recognition of those who witnessed the journey. For the former controllers, the impact of this change is immediate, because the certainty that cruelty would disappear without leaving a trace was replaced by an unisoned chorus of revealed facts. As they tried to turn you into the great villain of the narrative, they ended up creating a mirror that reflects their own ills. Each unfounded accusation and every attempt to diminish its value aimed to create the illusion that you were the origin of the entire conflict. However, as they directed so much energy to the attack, they revealed their own insecurities, weaknesses and lack of character. His firm and serene posture in the face of aggressiveness unmasked the oppressors without having to raise the tone of voice or retaliate in it

Coin. The contrast was evident to any attentive spectator. On the one hand, authenticity and balance. On the other, the smallness and despair of those who try to hide their own failure. The final error of these controlling minds was to forget a fundamental law of reality. The truth is self-sufficient and you will never need permission or consent to come out and prevail. At the end of everything, when dust and illusions fall apart, we realize that truth has its own irresistible strength. For a long time, they spent every drop of energy trying to create barriers, shape narratives and manipulate looks around. They built a fortress of strategically calculated lies, but full of flaws, believing that control over reality would last forever. But reality doesn't belong to anyone who tries... Try to control it; the truth has its own rhythm, growing in silence gaining momentum and waiting for the exact moment to act/emerge. And when that moment comes, no wall, no gate and no distorted version of the facts can contain her advancement. Every artificial scenario collapses under the inevitable weight of reality and undisputed facts. The great mistake of those who tried to manipulate history was to believe that they owned destiny, but the truth is sovereign, free from fears and immune to any kind of censorship. Now that same truth doesn't shut up anymore. It echoes with force, unmask appearances and moves in an overwhelming way before anyone who is willing to see things as they really are. 25 MONTHS SCHÜSSLER SALTER No the horoscope of rsrs whim. The 12 natural mineral salts are formed from the crystallization of some soil compounds by solar rays. It is by the position, each month of the year a different type of salt is generated from the composition of the soil and the position of the Sun. Bringing to practice, in a common pregnancy, the child is formed in 9 months, so we all have 9 of these salts present in abundance in the organism. The other three, I need extra. 26 So is the life of the chosen under the veil of amnesia. You have the maps of the kingdom, you carry the DNA of royalty, but if you're content with the recognition crumbs that the system offers to keep you busy, it hurts; The pain you feel when you look at the starry sky or when you hear a song that plays the inexplicable is the architect in you remembering the grandeur of the dome you came to build. It is necessary to understand that oblivion was a risk contract, a bet that the light within you would be strong enough to shine through the density of matter. The structure of this reality functions as a maze of mirrors that only reflects its flaws and its immediate needs, hiding his eternal heritage behind a curtain of trivial emergencies. The system doesn't want you to remember, because a chosen one who remembers your mission is an uncontrollable force that destabilizes the architecture of fear that governs this plan. When you forget, you become predictable, manipulable, above all, useful for purposes that are not yours. Spiritual amnesia is the invisible current that keeps eagles acting like chickens, ciscating on the ground in search of temporary validation, while the vast and open sky claims their presence. To recover the mission, you must first recognize that the identity you built to survive is just an oxygen mask, necessary for diving, but that should not be confused with your true face. The Bible brings us a profound revelation about this pre-existence and deliberate purpose in Jeremiah 1.5, where it is written, before I formed you in the womb, I knew you, and before you came out of the womb, I sanctified you and the nations gave you as a prophet. Notice that the word here is not I imagined you or I raised you at conception, but I knew you. This implies a previous relationship, a recognition of an essence that already existed in light before it became biological density. You were sanctified, that is, separated for an exclusive use, even before having an earthly name or family history. Spiritual amnesia tries to erase this intimate knowledge of God about you, replacing with the volatile approval of people who barely know themselves. When you begin to regain your mission, you are not learning something new, but are reactivating an ancient recognition that has been deposited into your cells by the Creator himself. The process of recovering spiritual memory often begins with what the world calls a crisis, but which the kingdom calls awakening. It is that moment when nothing else makes sense, when material conquests look like ashes in the mouth and when conventional success is revealed as a golden prison. This disorientation is, actually, the veil starting to rip, allowing the light of its origin to leak into its current reality. It is a painful process, such as the return of circulation in a limb that was asleep, bringing tingling and discomfort before full functionality. You begin to perceive patterns, synchronicities that look like encrypted messages and a thirst for truth that no entertainment can satisfy. Do not fight this sacred dissatisfaction, because it is the sign that the anesthetic of the world is losing its effect and the chosen one is coming to his senses. For the mission to be recovered, it is essential to discern between the voice of his ego, which seeks security and prominence, and the voice of his mission, which seeks service and obedience to the higher will. The ego feeds on forgetfulness, because it is the master of earthly identity. He wants you to believe that your story started in the maternity ward and ends up in the hospital. The mission speaks the language of eternity, using your life as an instrument to harmonize chaos around you. Memory recovery does not happen in a unique explosive event, but in the silence between thoughts, in the stillness where you stop trying to define yourself and allows to be defined by light. It's a systematic unlearning of everything you were told you were, so the truth of what you really are can finally emerge without obstructions. Consider the nature of time in this dimension and how it is used to keep spiritual amnesia active. Linear time enslaves us to the past, which is a cemetery of ancient versions of ourselves, and to the future, which is an altar for anxieties that may never come true. The mission, however, inhabits the eternal now, the point of intersection where the divine touches the human. When you are fully present, amnesia loses its strength, because spiritual memory is not a reminder of past facts, but a consciousness of a present reality that is hidden from physical eyes. Being a chosen one means living with one foot in each world, using the tools of time to perform works that

They have the seal of eternity. You are an ambassador who, though living on a foreign land, must maintain the customs, language and authority of your original homeland. The resistance so that you do not recover your mission is real and manifests through chronic fatigue, excessive information and digital distractions that fragment your attention. The enemy of your soul knows that if he can keep his mind fragmented, you will never have the focus needed to reconstruct the puzzle of your mission. Each useless notification, each empty discussion and each concern for the opinion of others are small suture stitches that reinforce the veil of amnesia. The chosen one must be a fierce guardian of his own attention, treating it as the most sacred resource he has, because it is through concentrated attention that the memory of the purpose is restored. The mission requires a clear mind and a heart willing to endure silence, for it is in the vacuum of the world's noises that divine instruction is finally heard clearly. Notice how the encounters in your life are not random, but us in a network of destiny that you yourself helped weave before you got here. Often you cross the path of other chosen ones who also suffer from amnesia, and the role of one is to serve as a mirror for the other. Sometimes a word said by a stranger or a deep look from someone you barely know works as a memory trigger, making a piece of your purpose fit in place. These are the moments of soul recognition, where amnesia fails and the light of one person greets the light of another. The chosen one is not alone in this recovery. There is an invisible network of vigilantes who rely, often unaware, through the frequency of their presence and integrity. The mission you are remembering is not necessarily a position, it is a title, a grand but invisible public achievement until you want it, a specific tonal note that you have come to issue in the creation chord. Your mission is to anchor peace in chaos environments. Bring clarity where the confusion, simply being a healing channel through silent compassion. Amnesia has made you seek the mission out of you, in great deeds that impress others, while the real mission is usually hidden in the way you deal with what is small and almost invisible daily with great results. 27 Spiritual lucidity really has that price. She takes comfort from certain illusions. What comes next is not harshness, it's maturity. And maturity often begins when you stop negotiating with what has already been shown to its real extent. You're not the most comfortable person to ignore, because your soul realizes before you agree. In you, there is that way of feeling that it crosses the surface. And that makes certain conversations affect you for days, and nobody realizes that. It's not fragility, it's an inner structure being trained to recognize what's alive and what's just custom. There are things that your family may see as drama, but that are actually the moment when your conscience refuses to accept the repetition of what has hurt you before. You feel the difference when a word comes full of disdain, or when a joke hides contempt, when a piece of advice comes just to demean you. And it wears me out, I know, because you go on living filtering the environment with an open heart. But that is also why God uses you with a kind of discernment that is not born of theory. You read the weight of a look, you realize the delay of an answer, you notice when the conversation tries to push you back to a smaller place. And what many would call too sensitive is the language by which God protects you. Do not accept the narrative that this is your invention. There is a difference between imagining persecution and recognizing real opposition. Your peace is not breaking for nothing. It's being tested so you can learn to come out of the noise without losing the tenderness. There is a silent opposition that usually enters through the cracks of home. And she doesn't come with monstrous face, comes with habits, jokes, interruptions, comparisons. And pressure for you to react as before. She tries to tire you out until you give up explaining what's already been understood deep in your soul. She piles up commitments, blows guilt, relives memories and makes what just wants to divert you from the center seem urgent. When you are about to decide clearly, the distraction appears. When you are about to pray honestly, the noise appears. When you are about to obey the divine order, there is a transvestite doubt of prudence. That's how the opposition works. She doesn't destroy at first, she disperses. And a scattered heart becomes easier to pull back. Maybe that's why you felt a strange struggle between wanting to insist and wanting to disappear. The urge to justify oneself is strong, but it does not always come from the spirit. Sometimes it comes from the old need to be understood by those who are not ready to understand. What God is doing is deeper than superficial reconciliation. He's taking from you the dependence of approval that holds your chest. You do not need to win in the cry that which will only be resolved in obedience. And obedience here begins when you stop calling home what has become a field of wear. There's an hour when the soul gets tired of explaining why it hurts and begins to realize that the correct name of pain has been whispered for a long time. You've already felt it in a dry phrase left in the air at a family meeting where your presence seemed displaced at a lunch where no one openly attacked you, but everyone measured you with some kind of distance. It was in this place that his faith began to become more serious, not a faith of appearance, but a faith that learns to cross the discomfort without losing the center. The heart knows when it is being compressed by a space that does not accept its expansion. And so does the spirit. You've spent too much time trying to be accepted where your own maturity has become tight. Maybe what hurt in your family was just your growth.

appearing before their permission. That doesn't mean contempt for anyone, but it doesn't mean submission to what erases you. There's a holy difference between honor and diminish. You can love and still recognize limit. You can respect and still leave the place that's hurting your identity. When Jesus was rejected on his own land, it was not because he lacked truth in him, but because his truth confronted the familiarity of those who knew him from before. That echo touches your story in a very concrete way. What bothers you today may prove that you are no longer the same version that the environment has learned to control. And it scares the people who wanted to keep you predictable. Before we move forward, let me lead you through an image that may be translating what you live without words. Imagine an old wooden door, the ones that creak when someone touches it, with the key stuck inside and the shadow of a narrow corridor behind it. You've been in front of this door too long, listening to footsteps from the other side, hearing voices that don't invite you in, but they won't let you go on either. Her chest knows this scene, because she's hit like this many times when a conversation seemed to close what should open in front of her. And what happens now is that God is revealing that it is not every family door that has been made to remain open. Some doors only exist to teach you not to confuse access with destiny. You tried to push, you tried to explain, you tried to find the right lock at the wrong time, and the tiredness on your shoulders was like you were carrying the whole house. But the key that matters is not in the effort to be understood. It's the moment you recognize that a forced opening is also a form of loss. The door that does not yield may be preserving you from remaining where your soul would be reduced. There is a moment when resistance ceases to be enemy and becomes alarm. And when that happens, shame loses power, because you understand that refusal is not rejection. It's mercy. Direction. The sound

The door closed is holier than the promise of a runner who would take you back to the same place. And that old door also says something else about you, the way you learned to move. 28 When someone tells you about love, remember that there are three of his types: Agape, Philia and Eros. One of them you don't have to deliver much to have. 29 You can and must dominate the most advanced systems of communication and finance that govern the corporate world. But your advanced knowledge in Excel combined will lead you to a recognition and tables that ordinary people don't even know exist. 30 In 2019 in the second half of the year, I worked for a Brazilian SAP consultancy that in 2020 was sold to a German giant named NTT Date, in 2012 the same German giant bought the Spanish consultant Everis Cobol specialist, and in 2020 bought this SAP specialist consulting where I worked in 2018 and 2019. One of the strengths of this consultation, among others, is a tool of its own that automates payments of NFS-and suppliers to various sectors, semi-automatically, even because there are many risk factors in this process, so there are all indicators and daily reports that ensure clear management, monitoring and workflow (approvals) by the contractor's tax department. My project was the implementation of this tool integrated with the ERP of one of the largest health insurance companies in Brazil. And so it was done, it was 8 months of project, few delays, it was delivered in December 2019 with all training and manuals for the fiscal team, Hypercare standard. We mapped and tested all possible and even impossible fraud or scams, after all, this implementation dealt with the process of automated payments of NFS-es. At the end of the project, my word was that, even with all the security and active monitoring, the fiscal team still needs to do the final part analyzing the indicators and approving the lots. The automated system defends up to 98% of the probabilities or possibilities of risk. 31 This is the direct effect of a cancellation that included, in what it cancelled, the closure of its ability to believe. I know how the files look when a case is raised for direct divine consideration. I know the specific quality of what is recorded when a cancellation comes from the highest level. The record does not write the cancellation as a favor. It does not register it as mercy in the general sense. The language of the record is more accurate than that. It registers as a response to recognition. Recognition of what was at stake. Recognition of what you carry. Recognition of the complete picture of who you are in the context of what was coming. And the determination, based on this complete picture, that the arrival of what was being built was not something that the complete record of what you are justified. That's the language. The cancellation was a response to recognition. Not to your perfection. Your conquest. To what you really are, seen completely in the light of what was coming. The throne saw something in your complete picture that made what was being built toward you the wrong result, and canceled it. When a soul learns that what was coming through it has been cancelled from the highest authority in the invisible, the darkness loses the ability to convince you that the delay will end. They cannot support the argument that what has been stopped is still coming. Then they change. They'll suggest that the cancellation was conditional, which can be reversed if you fail to meet requirements you're not aware of. That the decision of the throne is not as final as it sounds, and that your behavior from now on determines whether the cancelled thing remains canceled. When this one suggestion come, remember that. The authority that canceled it is the only authority that could reverse it. That same authority has the same complete picture of you you had when you made the original decision. The seeing is the same. The recognition is the same. The decision that was made in full view of everything you are has not been made provisionally. It was taken with complete information that remains complete. The cancellation is not conditional. It's settled. And what you should be doing with the life you have now is not observing the horizon for late arrival. It's building in space that's already been saved and now it's released to you. 32 100kl dry, fountain of youth n' infinite money. Why is God doing this specifically at this moment in history? We are living in a unique prophetic age, where God is preparing a generation of chosen ones for specific impacts that require extraordinary vitality, energy and capacity that transcend natural age limitations. The world is facing unprecedented challenges that require mature leadership combined with clean energy. God is creating a generation of leaders who have the wisdom of experience, but the vitality of youth. A combination that is needed to navigate the complex times that are to come. This rejuvenation is also an answer to the prayers of chosen ones who cried out to God for more time, more energy, more opportunities to fulfill the purposes that He placed in their hearts. God is literally extending and intensifying his productive years. As it is written in Isaiah chapter 46, verse 4, until your old age, I will be the same, and yet even the dogs I will carry you. I already have. I will take you, and I will carry you and save you. God is demonstrating that He can sustain and renew you regardless of your age. The evidence of this rejuvenation is the renewal of its creativity and capacity innovative. You're getting new ideas, creative solutions to old problems, artistic inspirations you haven't experienced in years or never experienced.) This creative renewal is not just inspiration, it is a supernatural restoration of capabilities that may have been diminished by time, stress or circumstances. God is reactivating centers of creativity in your brain and spirit, which are necessary for the innovative projects He has for you, you know what I'm talking about. You are discovering that you are writing, creating, inventing/developing ideas with an easy and fluidity that surprises you. This is evidence that God is preparing you for creative contributions that require an agile and early mind to the whole world. The evidence of the renewal of your ability to learn and adapt. You are absorbing new information more easily, mastering new technologies faster, adapting to changes with a flexibility that may have decreased at some point and now is in your apce and you feel it. This renewal of learning ability is not only neuroplasticity, it is the supernatural work of God, which now becomes of your natural operational execution, it is preparing you to navigate a rapidly changing world and to master new skills that will be needed for your future ministry and mission. He understood why he is learning languages more easily, understanding complex technological concepts, adapting to new situations with a mental agility that impresses him, is no longer surprised, is authority given by the kingdom of heaven direct of the creator acting in his mitochondria and consequently emanates via toroidal field. The rejuvenation of your spiritual life. Their ability to pray for long periods is gradually increased, and this is trainable. His sensitivity to the voice of God is sharper than ever, and he is experiencing spiritual manifestations with a renewed intensity. This spiritual rejuvenation is not only renewal of disciplines, it is a restoration of spiritual capacities that are being prepared for higher levels of responsibility and authority in the kingdom of God. He is receiving revelations with greater clarity, operating in spiritual gifts with greater power, experiencing the presence of God with an intensity he had not felt in years. The renewal of your emotional and psychological resistance. Situations that once made you stressed or overwhelmed now seem manageable. You have emotional stability and inner peace that transcend circumstances. This renewed resistance is not only maturity, it is an infusion of emotional strength that is preparing you to face intense challenges and pressures that accompany high levels of leadership and responsibility. You are understanding that you can handle criticism with greater grace, navigate conflicts with greater wisdom and maintain inner peace amid chaotic circumstances that once deeply disturbed you. 33 God has plans that if he told us all, we'd definitely ruin it. All the time there is wave, you can break it under, above, or buy a team and learn the surf!) And surfing demands to like a busy sea. 34 There's gonna be a brother who skeita like that!! PE SA DO. 35 Each of your choices was revealing something that even you had not finished finding out. His faith no longer depended on receiving immediately or even receiving what he asked for. You had started to trust, even if you didn't understand. And when a soul comes to that, something changes. Silence ceases to be a sign of abandonment and becomes a scenario of revelation. God does not ignore any of the

Your prayers. He was watching who you were becoming while you waited. The angels were surprised, not because they had never seen pain. They were surprised because you gave a different response to pain. They saw that even if you were wounded, you did not allow your spirit to be contaminated. They saw that even without visible evidence, you continued to stand and walk. They saw that when everything inside you asked to give up, you made a silent choice: to remain. And that decision had more weight than you think. Because there are times when a single attitude reveals a person's complete destiny. You believed you were just surviving, but actually, you were demonstrating that you could carry something bigger. That's why the sky kept an eye on you in silence. Not because there was nothing to say, but because your reaction was saying more than any word. And what happened after that instant has not yet been fully revealed to him. But before you show what started to move in your favor, you need to understand why that reaction was so unexpected and that part of you was being examined in secret. It was not his victory that caught the attention of the whole sky. It was not a visible achievement, an open door or unexpected news. It was your reaction always of equal effect, when nothing seemed to move, you move.)

Anyone can seem strong when they receive support, when the answers arrive at the expected time and when circumstances confirm that they are on the right track. But a person's true nature appears when signs disappear, when silence goes on and even hope begins to appear heavy. That's when your attitude started talking. Not by words, but by decisions. You could have hardened the heart, but you chose to preserve sensitivity. You could have returned the evil you received, but you chose not to become that. You could have abandoned everything you believed in, but you always kept the flame burning, not spark, flamethrower, even when it seemed insufficient to illuminate the next step: - Fuel always comes from the creator do not forget that. Remember? That's what surprised me. Not the fact that you are not afraid, but that you do not allow fear to direct your actions. Not the fact that you never doubt it, but that you keep moving forward even around questions. Not the fact that your heart never gets tired, but learning to walk while you were cured. And the kingdom of heaven recognized something that perhaps the people around them could not see. His obedience no longer depended on an immediate or visible reward. You had crossed an inner border. Before, I needed to understand to trust. Now I was beginning to trust even if I didn't understand. Before, I was looking for signs to see if I should continue. Now his character is becoming his own sign. This transformation did not happen in public. No one applauded your hard nights. No one announced the times when you needed to master an impulsive reaction, breathe deeply and choose peace when everything within you required another answer. Still, each of these moments had weight. Every time you refused to act from the wound, you showed that pain had no absolute authority over your life. Every time you decided to stand up without feeling any emotion, you showed that your purpose is deeper than your emotional state. And every time you continued to treat everyone with dignity, even those who did not understand you and the process, revealed a force that could not be explained only by human will. 36 The opposite of anxiety is security! 37 The whole world uses its own feelings to explain the paths it takes. When feelings are the simplest variables to deal with in virtually every scenario of life. Time and faith are much more valuable and premonitions.

38 This is the common form of a gift. But from time to time, much more rarely than people imagine, someone comes carrying a completely different kind of gift. Not something you have, something you are. A gift so built within the nature of who the person is, that there is no version of it without him. None of it with the gift removed, no ability to drop it, lose it, have it removed. The gift and the person are not related. They're the same thing. That's what I would call a constitutive gift. He doesn't live in what you do, he lives in what you're done. And constitutive gifts have a specific quality that separates them from all other types. They can't be imitated. You can learn to play convincingly without being a musician. You can study strategy and approximate the output of a strategic mind. You can practice the language of wisdom and produce something that sounds like wisdom without being wise. The distance between what you produce and what you are can be filled temporarily through discipline and imitation. But a constitutive gift cannot be imitated. Not because it's mysterious, because it doesn't operate from a distance. That's what it is, to the end, with nothing separating the surface from the depth. And a thing without distance between its surface and its depth cannot be replicated. A copy requires distance between the original and the copy. If there is no distance, if what something seems to be is exactly what it is, to the bottom, the copy and the original are the same thing. Which means the copy isn't a copy. Which means forgery is impossible. What you carry is a constitutive gift, built on what you are, not what you do. And the dark side discovered that his gift is the only thing that he fundamentally, permanently, structurally cannot replicate. And what this discovery has led you to do is what I need to tell you. The realm of darkness, at its deepest operational level, is a realm of falsification. I'm not saying that to build a story.

simple. I'm saying because it's structurally accurate. The ability to originate something that did not exist before, to call existence what was not, belongs only to the source of existence. When the darkness separated from that source, they lost that capacity permanently. What remained was the ability to imitate what light produces. That's why your most sophisticated products are always close versions of real things. Almost peace, almost wisdom, almost love. Close enough of the original to serve a purpose, different enough in the core to eventually reveal itself. The forgery operation is extensive. It's been working for an extraordinarily long time. It became very, very skilled in producing versions close to almost everything that comes from light. But forgery has a structural requirement that cannot be circumvented. A distance. To produce a forgery, you must produce something that seems to be what it is not. The fake note and the real note are different things. The distance between them, however small, however carefully hidden, is what makes counterfeiting possible. Without the distance, the copy is not a copy. The thing is what it looks like. Forgery doesn't exist. Your gift has no distance. What you are on the surface is what you are in depth. The performance layer, the space between what you present and what you are, never completely solidified in you. Not because you lacked sophistication, because your constitution did not build this space. What you are, is what you are, to the end. And every attempt to insert a distance between its surface and its depth found that the distance was not forming the way it forms in other people. When darkness tried to produce a forgery of their gift, they found something they had not found in that form in a very long time. Something that couldn't be faked. And the answer to finding something that can't be faked isn't neglect. In a kingdom built entirely on imitations, the only thing that cannot be imitated is the most valuable thing that exists. When the darkness recognized its gift for what it was, constitutive, without distance, fundamentally resistant to replication, the first response was not strategy. It was desire. Genuine, sustained, deep desire. Darkness has passed through existence surrounded by things they produced, by imitations and close versions and sophisticated copies of what they lost when they fell. And in all these imitations, there's something that never satisfies the way the original would. Something the copies can't provide that the real thing had. Reality. The quality of something being what it is, to the end. No distance, no copy, no performance. Your gift is real in this most essential sense. And the darkness does. Not to destroy it. Destruction would remove him from the world completely. And a gift that can't be faked is too valuable to destroy. Destruction would be the action of something that completely gave up. The darkness did not give up. They're bidding. Not always, obviously. Not always through visible temptation. Through the slower accumulation of offers. Through relationships that suggested that your gift would be more acceptable if you made it slightly smaller. Through systems that rewarded the version of you that fit in the expected format and that were at least penalizing the version that did not fit. Through seasons where maintaining your authenticity has cost you access to opportunities that accepting a smaller version of yourself would have opened. Through voices, some external, some already internal, which consistently suggested that your refusal to close the distance between what you are and what people expected was a liability instead of an asset. Each of these was a thing. An attempt to buy what couldn't be faked, convincing you to trade the original without distance for something more accommodated. And you didn't. Not always because you knew what was being offered. You probably didn't recognize most bids as bidding. But something in the gift itself refused the transaction. Because a gift Constitutive, something that is what you are, not something you have, cannot be negotiated without negotiating the very being that carries you. And the being continued to resist. Each time you failed to keep the version smaller. Every time the performance slipped back to the original. Every time someone asked you to adjust and got the real one. You weren't failing high management. The gift was refusing to sell. And the darkness is still begging. Now hold on, hehe knows how you're feeling,) what I just told you contradicts the story you've been telling yourself. You read the strain of carrying your gift as evidence of a failure. The friction that its authenticity creates in environments that expect performance. The exhaustion of a being who refuses to remain adjusted. The papers that seemed wrong when you couldn't be real inside them. The relationships that couldn't hold the weight of what you really are. The years trying to be a little more manageable and finding out I couldn't keep the fit. You called it a limitation. What was it? It is that you carried something genuine in a world organized around the production and consumption of imitations. And genuine things don't move smoothly through systems built under the assumption that everything has a distance between its surface and its depth. The friction was not evidence of his defect. It was evidence of its value. The bid kept failing because the gift is worth more than anything being offered in return. And the dark ones know what they're up for... bidding, like an auction looking for pitch. That's why they keep going. Let me show you five signs that this gift is already visible in your life and has been for a long time. The first sign is that you were never fully fixed. People who have studied you, tried to categorize you, built mental models of who you are and how you operate, found consistently that the model did not sustain itself. Not because you're inconsistent, because you're genuinely what you are. And genuine things don't submit to being filed in categories built to hold imitations. Every person who left saying he couldn't understand you completely was finding a gift that doesn't fit in the drawers available. The second sign is that what you produce from the most real place in you has a quality that work produced from other motivations does not have. Something people feel without being able to name. Something that registers as coming from somewhere real. This is the constitutive gift expressing itself through the output. What comes from a genuine source carries the mark of its origin. People know the difference even when they don't have words for what they're feeling. The third sign is that you have a specific visceral sensitivity to inauthenticity. Not just intellectual disagreement, dishonesty. A physical quality of something wrong when you find it, or presenting it as different from what it is. You register from a distance. That is the constitutive gift recognizing what is incompatible with. Genuine things are sensitive to imitation, the way imitations are not sensitive to each other. The fourth sign is that relationships that required you to maintain the adjusted version eventually became unsustainable at a cost that others around you could not understand. You weren't just difficult or exhausting. You carried a gift that required significant energy to suppress, and suppression was accumulating cost of non-visible forms for people who learned to live comfortably in the distance between your surface and its depth. The fifth sign is that you can't finally be convinced that it's nothing. Sustained seasons of opposition, external and then internal voices, pressed this case with considerable force, and yet something refuses the verdict. Quietly, persistently, without fanfare or argument, simply does not accept the description. This refusal is the constitutive gift knowing what it is, and refusing to receive a definition that does not correspond. Run, that, now I'm in the game as a player.

39 The sea is like the heavens, the deeper the darker, the more pressure, the lonelier, and the more full of God's presence. All divine architecture to show who shines by essence. And this dive isn't all ready to go. Stress ages, that's a fact. It eats from the inside, marks from the outside, exhausts everything. But there is a group of people who seem immune to stress wear. Not because they don't face problems, face and many. But because they learned not to let themselves be shaped by them. While the world implodes in anxiety and tension, these people breathe, look at chaos and maintain serenity. It's almost like they made a pact with peace, a peace deal. And that, of course, translates into youth. The secret is how they deal with life. They don't accumulate what they don't need, they don't carry pains that aren't yours. When stress hits the door, they don't open. And if they did, they know exactly how to control it and send it away at the right time. They understood that the world is noisy, chaotic and demanding, but that its interior can be a refuge, a safe haven if cultivated wisely. And when they access that state, they become untouchable. Because no matter what happens on the outside, there's a higher order inside. A firm calm, a force that prefers silence to noise. This posture disarms those who expected to lose control, it frustrates those who bet on the collapse. Because these people don't explode, they transcend. And what ages others, in them becomes strength. What makes others sick becomes clear in them. And so, while many are crushed by pressure, they follow light, young, almost immortal in spirit. Deep energy via root, and the one who wastes ages. Who does not know how to protect their vibe,) becomes sponge of the world.

40 Pero mientras el infierno te estudiaba con fascination perturbed. Dios was watching from a completely different perspective. Y lo que él vio te hizo deserving of intervention that changes destinations. For Dios, you integrity in the anomaly age that needs to be studied, was confirmation of something that is known about you from before that nacieras, something that is written in the fibers of you soul, something that ni el ovido de la falla logró blur. In eres persona buena que desarrolló integreidad a través de educación moral o presión social. Eres Ángel lanzado, soul, eligio embody specifically in this close to demonstrate that integrity can survive in the world that conspires against it. Dejame explain something about how the libre albedrío works in cosmic level. Before birth, las semillas tienen conversaciones con el Creador y en consejos, sobre que kind de vida quieren experiment. La mayoría elige lives from where tendrán administrable challenges, gradual apprentices, balanced opportunities. Pero exists an extremely rare category of angels that eliminates something different. Entities that volunteer specifically to embody in times from which values they consider fundamentals are masive cultural attack. These dicen something there. Quiero lanzarme en tiempo from where integrity is ridiculed, from where mantener palabra es considered ingenuidad, from where all to mi alrededor will tell me that soy fools not to avail atajos, because quiero probar que integrity puede survive included in this environment. Son llamadas en registros celestiales, soul ancla, because it comes specifically to anclarize eternal values in temporal epochs that intend to erosionarlos. And you're one of them. You didn't disarroll integrity because you had a moral education. I've been with you since before I was born. No mantuvist palabra because you are important. This is because it is written in the fundamental structure of quien eres. For those attempts perfectly diseñadas no funcione como. Because you're not trying to convince temporal personality, you're trying to break code that exists in soul level. And this code is unbreakable because it is forged in sizes from where corruption does not exist. Cuando el diablo comenzó applying protocol of respect, cuando sus princes empezaron estudiandote as phenomenon that in the logran explain, Dios convocó a los arcángeles para reunión specific sobre tu trayectoria. Miguel, Gabriel, Rafael, Uriel, all fueron called to review on the ground you present life, bell the soul contract that you signed before lanzarse, el plan en que Dios and you brought, the challenges you consciously elected to face. And how the archangels came to the level of difficulty that tu mismo requested, in order to observe the pruebas of integrity that you asked to try, cuando reconocieron que estou compliendo ese contrato con precisee que ni ellos anticipaban, la reacione de asombro reverente. Michael, who I warrero, I say something that seldom tells about humans. This pidio soul batalla field y is fighting with honor that equals celestial warriors.) Each temptation rejects the victory that resues in higher dimensions. Gabriel Mensajero, observant. The pruebas that this soul eligió face harian that la mayoría had given up before birth. Pero mantiene integrity as si tuviera conscious memory of the contract, as you will recall by qué eligió difficult. Rafael, sanador, analizó con compasión. The emotional cost of maintaining integrity in the world that punishes integrity is generating deep inherited. Pero this soul prefers pain of integrity that commodified of compromise. It's a practical one. Y Uriel, illuminator, I declare something that Hizo Dios take immediate decision. It's complicit soul function ancla, exactly as we planned it. It is maintaining integrity visible in era from where integrity seems to have disappeared. It's smelling, sin siquiera know what's nose. Fue en ese momento que Dios decided to have something that soil hace cuando soul ancla prueba to be operating at the level of excellence that justifies direct intervention. Illama proportional reward. The acceleration protocol from where the universe mismo reorganizes to compensate mathematically every time integridad te costó oportunidad, every moment from where to do it right you lose wind, each situation from where maintainer palabra te perjudicó temporally. This is in the generic Dharma, this precise spiritual accounting, from where each perdida by integrity is converted into multiplied greed, from where every opportunity you have rejected for moral reasons becomes in oportunidad mejor that appears in timing perfecto. And the activation of this protocol ya comenzó en tu aunque todavía no reconozcas las senales. Recuerdas es a situación hace dos seginas dos quem mantuviste tu palabra, aunque rorla te habitria benefited immediately?) From whence thou hast committed, an unque la otra persona no habitria se known no lo hacías. From where you elected honesty knowing you'd cost you. You seem to have lost something in that moment, pero active. In exactly cuatro días después de esa decisión, something unexpected appeared in tu vida, la oportunidad que no buscabas, la conexión que no planeabas mas, la solución que no anticipabas y fue. In the fue coincidencia, fue proportional reward operating. The universe registration tu integrity, calculó el costo which you paid for maintainerla y manifestosó compensación equivalent multiplied by spiritual merit factor. And I am continuing to accelerate in the coming months, in ways that van a hacer impossible deny that something supernatural is operating in you favor. 41 I am, morning star and light bearer from now on. The fishhead cherub is just dirt on the bottom of my shoe. 42 The way you interact with the world really needs to change, because you are about to understand that you are infinitely more than you believe to be infinitely more real power, infinitely more connected. Is your mind really open to this? What do you expect to find out about yourself that you never found out before? In ancient times, there were guardians of knowledge, spiritual masters, priests of civilizations who no longer exist today. They kept secrets, secrets about human nature, about who and who we really are. And among these secrets, there was one in particular that was transmitted only to those who were considered capable, those who went through evidence, those who demonstrated to be ready. This gift was called in different ways in different cultures. In some traditions, it was known as the awakening of the third vision, in others, as the divine touch. Some called it the enlightenment of the spirit, but all, without exception, recognized the same thing. This ability could completely transform a person's existence. Do you feel something missing in your life? A deeper connection? A greater purpose? An understanding that goes beyond words? Well, that void you feel is exactly the calling of that gift already manifesting. He's knocking on his subconscious door saying, look here, I'm here, I'm real, it's time to wake up. But here's the challenge. You need to be really willing to receive this information. Because once you activate that gift, you can't go back to what you were before. You can't see what you saw, you can't deter what you felt. You change deeply. The activation of this gift follows a process. It's not magical in the sense of a magic pass. It's natural, it's like waking up from a very deep sleep. First you start to notice all synchronous combinations. All the numbers that repeat, you think of someone and that person appears in your freight, or you see somewhere real. You now have intuition about something and then you find out you were absolutely right. That's the beginning, that's the first wink of it waking up in you. Then comes increased sensitivity. You begin to feel the energy of people undeniably, the climate of a environment, the true intention behind someone's words. It's like winning a sixth sense. And it changes the sceneries, because you start moving in the world differently, more conscious, more authentic, more powerful. And here's what nobody's told you yet. You're among the first to activate this. Yeah, the first ones. Because this capacity, for a long time, has been suppressed, controlled, kept out of reach. There was interest in you not knowing your own potential. There was interest in you feeling dependent. But now it's different. The information is flowing, the secrets are coming out. And you, chosen to be here at this very moment in history, have access to knowledge your past generations never had. Can you imagine what that means? Can you feel the weight of this responsibility?! Because yes, it's a responsibility too! Once you wake up, you're called. You are called to grow, to evolve, to serve a greater purpose. The first step is to recognize. Simply recognize that you have this ability. To accept that's not a coincidence. Many people can't even take that step because they're afraid. Fear of the unknown, fear of change, fear of becoming something different than they ever were. The second step is intention. You must genuinely want to activate this gift. Not because it's modern, not because your friends are waking up, but because you understand at its core that it's time, that you're ready, that you want to grow no matter what price it may cost. The third step is practice. And this is where it all comes true, because you won't wake up tomorrow with supernatural powers. It doesn't work like that. You're gonna start small. Meditation, observation, active listening, connection to your body, attention to your intuitions. The conscious surrender to the process. Something that is crucial to understand. This awakening changes your relationship with time. People who activated this ability begin to experience life in a very different way temporally. Past, present and future no longer seem so separate. Now, they have gained a much greater perspective, a vision that transcends the present moment. Have you ever had that feeling you've lived something before? Have you ever felt a strange familiarity with a place you've never visited? That's the gift of loud speaking. It's like parts of you that lived the other life, that existed in another time, are waking up in this life now.) Because here is a profound truth that few religions and few philosophies have the courage to embrace completely. You didn't start to exist when you were born in this life. You're a lot older than that. You're an eternal soul having a human experience. And your previous experience, all the wisdom you've accumulated through the centuries, is stored within you, ready and performing access. The gift of 2,000 years is therefore the ability to access this eternal memory. Connecting who you've always been. To understand that you're much bigger than the individual ego you've identified as you have all your life. This is gonna change your life, and a lot. Absolutely it will. But not instantly. It's a process, a path, a journey that lasts a lifetime. And you know what the most interesting part is? It's just that you're not alone. There are millions of people on the planet now who are going through the same process, who are connecting with their deepest essence. There's a wave of consciousness going through the entire planet. And you're on top of that wave. 43 Independent verification of inconsistencies, almost always thought everyone had it. Today I see it's very rare. 44 Darmic silence, 45 image via tcpip and rfc have the power to access qqr mov device or fixed planet, q contains hd, cam or mic? 46 God created the universe with a perfect timing for everything. He saw your patience, it wasn't a weakness in disguise, it was a refined force, it impressed us. To all heavenly beings who have seen millions of human stories. You have demonstrated a kind of emotional resistance that causes angels to stop their activities to observe a human being operating at divine frequency. And here's what they found watching you. His patience was not based on fear of action, it was based on wisdom, knowing that some rewards only come for those who can wait without anxiety, without despair, without pressing the heavens to deliver before the hour. Each second of his wait was catalogued as evidence of extreme spiritual maturity. You didn't just wait, you waited with dignity. You didn't just stand it, you put up with class. You didn't just resist, you resisted with unwavering faith. That is why the angels were impressed, because they saw someone demonstrating a level of patience they rarely observe among humans. A patience that does not break under pressure, does not corrupt with delay, does not turn into bitterness when waiting is prolonged. And it was this profound impression that triggered a specific heavenly decree. Prepare a reward proportional to the exceptionality of your patience. His patience broke all the heavenly records we had already cataloged on human resistance. Because you didn't just wait long, you waited a long time keeping a positive attitude, faith intact, hope alive while praising.) Most people can be patient for days, some for weeks, few for months. But you had patience for years, maintaining the same emotional quality as the first day. That's statistically impossible.

according to normal parameters. The angels expected you to break in the third month. Then in the sixth month. Then the first year. But you continued to show patience that did not diminish over time, did not wear out with delay, did not turn into bitter resignation. And this generated a new request, because the angels did not have a protocol prepared for such patience. They had to create a special category in the files, because their resistance did not fit into any existing classifications. So they stopped everything they were doing to study you. They wanted to understand how a human being can maintain genuine patience for so long without losing emotional quality, without developing bitterness, without giving up on the inside while he was still on the outside. Then they found out what hit them. With this they understood that you were not just waiting with a common patience, you were waiting with a kind of emanations from the throne, operating at such a high frequency of trust that you approached the levels of faith that only heavenly beings normally demonstrate. His patience transcended human limitations and entered angelic territory. That's why they were impressed. They were no longer observing only one human being having patience, they were observing an ancient soul while still inhabiting a physical body operating in divine consciousness. And when angels are impressed with human performance, they do something that rarely happens. They raise their whole story... 47 The planting is mandatory. The harvest is optional. - To unlock your mind. 48 Let's uncomplicate it, but arriving with both feet at the door.) Your heart is the fruit of the tree of life, is in the midst of your garden/garden God, and it is on this ground, where the divine plans for your life are sown. However, the heart is even deceptive, because some seeds when cultivated in it can feed only its central nervous system which is the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the fruit is the ego, there is a ground where you literally should not want to plant anything. Because it is exactly his energy pathway + and grounding - for all other systems, it goes from the sole of his feet connected to the ground, even footwear, to the tip of his last hair. 49 Kami kara no shirushi 50 "These defeats of mine are very good." What a fantastic phrase! 51 Current combinations force all timelines, what they did and what they would do, collapse and merge into one timeline. Exactly to have excuses, the house is being cleaned. 52 Gaining or losing power is the thermometer!) 53 This scenario is the new reality!!! Royal authority. No more trading favors. 54 1. 2. 3. ?The simple lack of a personal purpose is what is causing your romantic obsession.?

4. ?You need to develop understanding about yourself so as not to internalize the beliefs that others have about you.? 5. ?The degree of growth of a person is directly proportional to the amount of truth that he can accept about himself without running away.? 6. 7. 55 I need you to pay attention now, in everything, the last thing I'm going to say, is the scenario that activates you, when you understand what was actually being disputed. Let me take you somewhere first. There is a pattern in Brazil that most people recognize, but few name directly. The presence that raises the environment around him without taking credit for what the environment produced. You go into a project and it comes to life. You join a team and she finds the path you couldn't find. You appear in a situation that was stuck and something unlocks that has no obvious explanation, even before the technical change you consciously made. The environment grows, but the credit goes to the environment, not to you. And then you leave, either because the situation is over, or because everything has already been delivered, or because you just couldn't give so much more to receive little. And whoever stayed in the environment feels the difference without being able to name what changed. You've lived several versions of it and read it as evidence that you chose poorly the environments, which were too generous with the wrong people, which needed to be more strategic about where you put the energy. What I'm going to show you now is that the reading was completely wrong. Not because the environments were good or honest people, but because the reason why they attracted you, the real reason that was never declared, reveals something about what you produce that completely changes the meaning of every undervalue season that you went through. Not because there is deliberate effort to hide, because it is the kind of knowledge that becomes competitive advantage when someone understands it. And competitive advantages lose value when distributed widely. People who operate at the levels of observers without complete talent and dubious influence without realizing what emanates. They've learned over many years, watching, drying and talking nonsense to each other, patterns that most people never have a position and free time to observe. Something about certain types of people who cannot be bought, manufactured or trained to exist. They learned that certain people, when placed in close proximity to a project, a team, an environment, a conversation, produce something in that environment that has no proper name in common language, but has measurable, verifiable, repeatable effects. Not through any specific skill they employ, not through any strategy they execute, not through any effort they consciously direct. Simply by being present and genuine in the way they are present. The decisions that are made improve quality, the creativity that was blocked finds the way, the conflicts that were entrenching find resolution, the energy of the environment reorganizes around something that was not organized before. And more importantly, people in that environment begin to produce more than they are capable of producing. Not because they're managed differently, because something about this person's presence specific triggered something in them that was sleeping. People who operate at observer levels without a view of who you are, have a name for it that they don't use in any public context. They call it environmental catalysis. You're not the catalyst because of what you do, you're the catalyst because of what you are. And what you are produces a field effect on the environment that operates completely independent of your conscious intent. Now I need to tell you what happened when people who understood environmental catalysis found what you produce. Because here's the center of everything you're seeing, listening, reading, and now you have the names. When someone with this type of vision and recognition of a sufficient pattern identifies a genuine environment catalyst, someone whose presence produces the specific field effect that we have just described, the first answer is not admiration, the first answer is positioning, creating circumstances that attract the catalyst to the proximity of what you want catalyzed, making the environment attractive enough, the opportunity convincing enough, the situation aligned enough with what the catalyst genuinely cares about, so that it enters the ecosystem by apparent will, even if it is unethical, without morals, compromising the bonds themselves thinking that they are hidden behind a keyboard using TCPIP V6 like everyone else, without vpn, without international servers with encryption in the FWs. But it works, because catalysts by nature are drawn to situations where their presence makes a difference, where something is genuinely at stake, where what they produce, without knowing consciously what they produce, is necessary. They do not enter environments because they were acquired, they enter because the environment genuinely needs what they carry. But here's what you need to understand about what was happening simultaneously. When an operator identifies a genuine catalyst and begins to create positioning circumstances, other operators operating in the even level of pattern recognition perceive, not the catalyst, the positioning behavior, and recognize it immediately, because they have already done it themselves. And start the positioning itself. A competition begins, not in front of you. You're not in the room where this happens, you're the guy you're competing over, not one of the parties to the negotiation. Competition happens between operators who understand what you produce and each is trying to be the ecosystem that gets access to it. And the fact that you were in specific environments that looked like coincidence, or opportunity that seemed to emerge out of nowhere, or doors that opened without obvious cause, that was no coincidence the pattern of the average, warm Brazilian, and seem dumb, he pretends to pretend, but in the end, he cannot pretend. It was the result of the competition. Someone won the positioning contest for that season, and you entered their ecosystem. And his presence produced what his presence produces. And they got the benefit of it. While you, the catalyst, the source of the field effect, the reason why the competition happened, may have received very little that corresponded to what you were actually contributing. Now hold this against the specific pattern of your life. You felt undervalued, not occasionally, as a consistent experience in different environments, different people, different seasons. The feeling that what you brought was received and used, but not properly recognized or compensated. That what you produced in the environments benefited more the environments than you. You probably read this as evidence of something wrong with you, that you weren't advocating properly, that you were too generous with energy, that you needed to be more strategic about what you gave and who. Turn around completely. Consistent undervaluation is not evidence that what you produce has low value. It is evidence that it has the kind of value for which operators compete silently, they use extensively and have no incentive to disclose completely to the person who produces it. When you understand what environmental catalysis is, undervaluation makes structural sense. The moment a catalyst understands what he produces, the nature of the relationship between him and the people who were benefiting from the field effect without his knowledge changes fundamentally. The catalyst can no longer be positioned without consciousness. You can start directing what you intentionally produce instead of producing for whoever has managed to put you in the room. And that, the transition from unconscious catalyst to conscious catalyst, is what each operator who benefited from its presence without its knowledge, has more interest in preventing it from happening. Let me show you five signs that what I'm describing has already been active in your life. The first sign is that the environments you entered, even those that eventually disappointed, consistently produced visible results that you could not claim directly, but that clearly corresponded to your presence. Projects advanced when you joined, conversations changed when you arrived, situations that were stuck found resolution at intervals of time that exceeded what should be possible without your presence. You realized that pattern even without being able to explain it. The second sign is that you were recruited, invited, included, attracted by people whose interest in you exceeded what your visible credentials at that time would predict. People who shouldn't be interested in you for any conventional metrics were specifically interested in you. This is pattern recognition from someone who's learned to identify catalysts. They were not responding to what you had publicly demonstrated, they were responding to something they felt directly in you. The third sign is that when you left environments, these environments experienced a visible decline in the types output specifics that corresponded to its presence. Not immediately in all cases, but over time. Things that were moving stopped, energy that was present dissipated. This is the field effect withdrawing when the catalyst is no longer present. The fourth sign is that the competition for access to his presence sometimes manifested itself as a conflict around him that seemed disproportionate. A conflict around you that seemed disproportionate to anything you consciously did to provoke him. People or forces who had no obvious reason to be in conflict were in conflict specifically in contexts involving access to you. You got confused because you were looking for a cause in the level of visible behavior, and the cause was operating at the level of competition for an asset. The fifth sign is that their most significant contributions have consistently come not from their more hard work, but from their more genuine presence. The moments when you helped someone the most weren't the moments when you worked harder. Those were the moments when you were being more completely yourself, unprotected, genuinely present, not managing how you were performing. That's the field effect operating at full force. Let me be honest with you now in my own voice. You've been here long enough. I know how the competition looks from inside the rooms where it happens. I was there when the specific dynamics I'm describing were in operation around people whose field effect was genuine. And I need to tell you what these operators understand, that they never release to the catalyst. They understand that the field effect is not transferable. You cannot extract what a genuine catalyst produces and applies elsewhere. He cannot train another person to produce the same effect. It cannot manufacture the environmental catalysis through any combination of strategy and effort. It exists in the specific person and exists in total force only when that person is operating from genuine alignment. When what you're doing corresponds to what it really is. That's the detail that makes competition so intense. Because a catalyst operating out of genuine alignment still produces a field effect, but is attenuated, silenced. A fraction of what is produced when the catalyst is genuinely purpose-oriented. The people who positioned you in their ecosystems were getting an attenuated version. Not because your field effect is weak, because you were not yet operating with the understanding of what you really carry. And the competition that's been going on around you, including the fight we describe here, is between forces that know what your presence in total alignment would produce and each one is trying to be the context in which this total expression happens. But here's what none of them can control. You choose what and who you go along with. The catalyst is not a passive resource,) not at all.) When you understand what you produce, you become the agent of the direction of it, you are the one who sows your seed. And no amount of competition between those who want access to what you carry determines where you direct it. This is all yours. It's always been yours. The rarity of that kind of life comes from you. You just didn't know it was something to be directed. One final thing before I let you go. When a soul understands that it is a genuine environment catalyst, that forces from all directions have competed for access to what its presence produces, darkness finds a new argument. They'll say, if that's true, why did the people who benefited from your presence treat you like they treated you? - If you were so valuable to them, why were you undervalued, ignored, inadequately compensated? Does the treatment you received not prove that this framework is flattering you beyond what the evidence supports? When that argument comes, and it will come, remember that. The value of what you produce and the treatment you received from those

They're not in the same equation. People treat catalysts like they treat any resource they don't fully understand. They do, they don't always do. The absence of honor does not reduce value. It reveals the limitation of those who retain it. What changes now is not that people will automatically start to honor what you carry. What changes now is that you understand what you carry. And a catalyst that understands what it produces stops entering environments by accident and starts choosing environments intentionally. Stop contributing to ecosystems that consume output without recognizing the source and start directing the field effect to what was actually designed to serve. The competition has always been about your presence. Now, for the first time, your presence is completely in your hands. 56 At the center of everything you will receive now, there is the truth about what Michael observes in you, and it is not, above all, the action. Any action can be produced by numerous different interior conditions. The same external action can be born of fear, calculation, genuine character or disability. Just looking at the action says very little about what really exists there. What Michael observes is the inner condition that produced the action. And what he found in examining what produced his restraint was something he hadn't seen at that level in a long time. His power over that person was real. Your access to her vulnerability was real. His justification for using that power was also real. Miguel confirmed all this during the evaluation. The conditions were completely established. Nothing in the structure of the situation would be wrong if you had used what was at your disposal. Your cause was enough. And the inner condition that produced its containment was not afraid of the consequences. It wasn't a strategic calculation of what would be best for you in the long run. It wasn't even a decision.

consciously taken after deliberation. It was something operating on a deeper level than the decision itself. Something that already existed in you before that moment even came. When that moment came, it just wasn't in your nature to direct power against someone's wound. Not the wound that person caused on you, but her own wound. Your points of genuine vulnerability. The parts of her that were really exposed to what you had the ability to do. You couldn't direct power to this place. Not because you were incapable, but because what you are, at the level that produces the choices that reveal who you really are, is not the kind of being that uses power to hurt someone's vulnerability. Even when this vulnerability seems deserved. Even when no one would find out. Even when using it would seem like justice. Michael looked at this inner condition and recognized something specific. You recognized what she was made of. And what it was made of is something that the darkness, structurally, cannot produce. Genuine mercy. Not mercy as weakness. Not mercy as incapacity. No mercy as lack of power. Mercy as the presence of power and the choice not to use it to destroy, even when destruction is guaranteed. Even when she seemed fair. Even when no one would know the difference. This is structurally incompatible with what darkness is. Darkness can produce containment for strategic reasons. If using power costs more than not using it, they contain themselves. That's calculus, not mercy. Darkness can produce patience when patience serves a purpose. Waiting for a better time to attack is strategy, not mercy. But to contain oneself without strategic advantage, with complete justification, without external observation and with full capacity to act, this is not something that darkness can generate. Because darkness is organized entirely around the use of power over vulnerability. This is its fundamental operational principle:

power applied on vulnerability, whenever this opportunity is available. The inner condition that made you not use this power operates according to a completely different principle. And Michael, looking at this inner condition, understood exactly what he was seeing. ?This soul is not only representing goodness. This soul is truly made of something that the enemy cannot reproduce or understand. This is the soul that I personally choose.? Now compare this to the story you've been carrying. You interpreted that moment of restraint as weakness. Like not making someone pay you back. How to choose a less satisfying result when the most satisfying seemed completely within your reach. You told yourself, in the language of pragmatic people, that the world does not reward that kind of choice; that you gave up an advantage you had. But look at everything from another angle. What you gave up was not an advantage. What you failed to use was the opportunity to demonstrate that you are made of the same matter as the enemy. And by not taking this opportunity without witnesses, without strategy and without conscious deliberation, you have shown exactly the opposite: that what you are made of is something that the enemy cannot touch, reproduce or even classify. What you did at that moment was not weakness disguised as virtue. It was the most accurate demonstration of what really exists inside you. Let me show you five signs that this is already visible in your life. The first sign is that the people who came against you with more intensity were consistently people who, when examined closely, were operating from a position of power over someone who could not defend himself fully from them. You weren't always the most obvious target, but you were vulnerable in a specific way. They had access to this vulnerability and used it. You recognized that feature in them, even when you couldn't.

Name her, because she's the exact opposite of what you carry. The second sign is that people, in their most vulnerable moments, are drawn to you in ways that even they cannot explain. Not by your power. Not by your resources. But for you. Specifically when they're less protected. When you have more to lose in case you betray what you've decided to show. They approach in these moments, not always consciously, because something inside them recognizes, at a deeper level than any explanation, that you are not the kind of person who turns into a weapon what others reveal when they are helpless. The third sign is that their restraint remained constant in different relationships and at different stages of their lives, even when circumstances changed considerably. This is the signature of an inner condition, not a simple choice of behavior. Behavioral choices tend to be inconsistent when subjected to different types of pressure. But inner conditions that really are part of who you are produce the same result in different contexts. The consistency of your restraint is evidence that what produces it is not a decision you need to make every time. It's something that's just part of you. The fourth sign is that you lived the specific experience of someone who hurt you become vulnerable before you later, and you chose to act differently from the way that person acted. You had access to what she exposed. It had the justification provided by her previous actions. And yet you didn't use it against her. Not because the circumstances prevented you, but because you just wouldn't do it. And at that moment, you knew, with a clarity that few moments offer, that you were making a different choice from what that person had made when you were in the position of power. The fifth sign is that what happens to people who really abuse the power they have over you

It doesn't depend on your participation. You don't organize these consequences. You're not looking for them. But there is a pattern in your history: people who have turned access to your vulnerability into a weapon end up finding a specific kind of consequence that you have not provoked. That pattern is no coincidence. Now, let me speak honestly in my own voice. You've been here long enough to hear it. I know what the evaluation was like on the other side when that moment in your life was examined. I've been in the rooms where souls are classified by what they do when they have power over the vulnerable. I know the categories. I know what every inner condition produces in the record. And I want to tell you what happened when the darkness tried to classify what produced their restraint. The dark Ones find something that seems to be contained with a certain frequency. The first answer is always trying to classify it. They're looking for the strategic calculation hidden beneath it. They're trying to locate the fear that pushed her. They try to identify the advantage that soul gained by making that choice. There's almost always something. Fear of the consequences. Need for approval. Social representation. Long-term calculation. There's always an explanation. But the evaluation of his specific moment went through this whole process and returned without classification. Because there was no strategic advantage to what you chose. There was no fear of the consequences driving his decision. There was no identifiable calculation in the internal registry. The condition that led him not to use power over vulnerability simply did not correspond to any category in that system. And in the operational language of darkness, a soul that cannot be classified by the way it deals with power over the vulnerable represents something fundamentally different. Not necessarily stronger. But made of a substance your instruments can't measure. And Miguel, when he realized that the classification had returned empty, understood immediately what was before him. A soul whose inner condition was the most accurate demonstration of genuine goodness. Not someone representing kindness. But someone truly formed by it. And it was that soul he deliberately chose personally, because it was exactly that kind of soul he was looking for. Now I need to keep you on your toes for the last thing. When a soul discovers that Michael chose her for what she refused to do with the power she possessed over the vulnerability of another person, the darkness changes argument. They'll tell you: ?If this is true, why has its containment not produced better results?? ?If choosing not to turn the vulnerability of the other into a weapon was really the right way, why did you suffer? Why wasn't he rewarded? Why does it seem that those who did not have mercy prospered for so long?? That's exactly where the prosecution changes shape. She stops attacking your character and starts attacking your trust, trying to convince you that the mercy that has always been with you was a mistake and that kindness was not worth it. 57 We talk about what we know and testify to what we saw.

Baguiélokomem @kenomirn They've been waiting this long, much longer than we have. Just imagine... 58 Patience. That's not a weakness, that's neurology, that's adaptation. The human nervous system is designed to find stability, even in unstable conditions. When instability lasts long enough, the system learns to treat instability as stability. Not because you gave up, because surviving requires finding the ground that exists where you are, even if the ground is not where it should be. And then something

Turns out the nervous system can't process easily. The condition that became the ground changes, the waiting room closes and the person who spent years learning to live in the waiting room, suddenly is in an environment that no longer has the walls of waiting, but continues to operate as if it had, continues to be called, keeps keeping the expectations calibrated for the space of the waiting room, keeps leaving the space closed for what the waiting room did not allow. Not because he's in denial, not because he doesn't want the waiting to end, because the end of the condition is not announced with dramaturgy. It happens while you're doing something ordinary, playing your day-to-day. And the absence of ad creates a window where you continue to live within a structure that no longer exists. In the invisible works just like that. Now, I need to tell you what was being prepared on the other side of the door while you were in the waiting room. Because here's the center of everything we're talking about right now. This waiting room is not a punishment. It's not evidence that something's wrong with you. It is not the result of insufficient faith or choices that should have been different. It is a structure that exists because what a soul is destined to do, on a real level, requires certain things to be in place before it goes into full operation. Not because your soul is unable to see before they are, but because the full expression of what that soul was put here to do requires a specific configuration that was not yet assembled. People moving into position, doors being unlocked from the inside before you arrive, so they open the moment you touch them, instead of requiring you to force them. Forces being arranged in configurations that only make sense when you're moving through them. Circumstances aligning in order that produces the specific result rather than a premature version that would collapse under its own weight. The stage for what you're here to do was being set up. Not for you. You

I was in the waiting room. By divine movements and alignments in the invisible being coordinated without their participation, without their consciousness and without their ability to hasten or influence by their own effort. And the moment the stage reached its conclusion, the moment the last element locked into the configuration it needed to be, the waiting room closed. I'm not waiting for you in the abstract. The specific expectation that corresponded to an exact set of things not yet assembled now corresponds to things that are assembled. The waiting room had a condition of completion. The condition has been fulfilled. Wait's over automatically. No ceremony, no announcement. While you were in the middle of something ordinary, you left the waiting room. Now hold that. You've been reading this waiting as evidence of something wrong with you, something insufficient, something that needed to be corrected, overcome or developed before advance was allowed. You collected the evidence carefully. Every door that didn't open, every effort that didn't produce what should have been produced, every season that should have been different from what was and wasn't. You built a case against yourself from the evidence in the waiting room. And then, because the case seemed solid and the wait lasted long enough, you adjusted, stopped expecting certain things; not dramatically, but gradually. Expectations that did not come true long enough eventually became expectations that you stopped carrying. You made peace with a smaller version of what you were originally oriented to be. He said this was wisdom, maturity, realism, learning not to want more than what comes. Forget it completely. The case against yourself was built from misread evidence. The doors that didn't open didn't open because the stage wasn't ready, not because you were handicapped. The effort that did not produce the expected result, did not produce it because the field configuration, outside the waiting room, still

I wasn't in the place to welcome you. Not because his effort was misdirected or his faith was insufficient. The waiting room was the waiting room, not a verdict on its value. A structure that corresponded to something in the invisible that was now completed. And the version of the things you made up with is not the final version, it was the version available inside the waiting room. The full version, which corresponds to your real call, is what you are about to enter. Now, its long awaited five signs that the waiting room has already closed and what was being stored is already in motion.)) The first sign is that your sense of anticipation has changed in quality recently. No hope in the ordinary sense. You've had hope before and watched her produce less than you should. This is something quieter and more directional. A quality of readiness within you that arrived without obvious cause. Something about you is ready for something you still can't name. This readiness is the soul recording what the end of hope produces, before the evidence in the visible world has accumulated. The second sign is that resistance in specific areas of your life has changed in texture. Not missing, but different in character. Things that had a quality of hardness, of being blocked from within the situation, rather than simply difficult on the outside, softened in ways that do not correspond to anything you specifically did to address them. This smoothing is the completing stage and the setting becomes available to receive you. The third sign is that certain people have recently appeared, or reappeared, in ways that have no obvious explanation. People whose presence makes a specific kind of sense even when you still can't articulate what sense it is. Whose arrival seems less like a new beginning and more like a piece fitting into a place that was waiting for her. The fourth sign is that the version of you that you set, the smaller version, the realistic version, the built version within the

Waiting room, has been less comfortable recently. A growing inner discomfort with the accommodations you've made. A sense that what you accepted is no longer something that your insides are willing to hold peacefully. This discomfort is the soul recording that the waiting is over and the accommodations made for waiting are no longer structurally necessary. The fifth sign is that we're here together, hearing this, with something in you that didn't rule out the opening, something you recognized before recognition could be processed, that you didn't pass through, that you did. This recognition, coming before the explanation, is the signature of something that happened in the invisible, registering in the only available form before you have the information to fully understand it. But I need to keep you on your toes. I need to tell you specifically what the conclusion of your wait has produced on people who don't want to see you outside the waiting room. The most sophisticated strategy that darkness turns against souls in waiting rooms is not what you would expect more. It's not to extend the wait. The wait is not in their control. The conditions of conclusion are set at a level exceeding what they can change. The stage mounts according to forces that can influence the margins, but not fundamentally redirect. The most sophisticated strategy is to make you permanently become the person the waiting room required, so that when the wait is over, you won't recognize the end and continue operating as if you were still inside it. If the wait is over, but you're still acting as if not, still keeping low expectations, still not approaching doors that are now open, still not making room for what is now positioned to arrive. The practical effect is close to continuing waiting. Not because the lock is still active, because you'd be blocking yourself. That is the strategy that has become the final phase of your waiting. Not extend it, make you permanently become the inhabitant of the waiting room, so that when She closed, you didn't know how and where to get up to take over your promised authority. And then what I need to tell you isn't just that the wait is over, it's that you need to stop acting like it's not over. The adjustments you made were rational and appropriate within the waiting room. But the waiting room is gone. And every adjustment you carry forward, every expectation you keep smaller than it was before the wait begins, every door that you stop coming near, every space in your life where you closed the possibility for what was being saved, is you continuing to live within a structure that no longer exists.

Without Jesus, who am I? Nothing.

1 Archetype Jesus, that I make a point. The rest is nothing. Including me, who is Jonah without Jesus? Nothing. There's something you need to understand about human judgment. Human judgment operates from a very limited perspective. It operates from ego, comparison, envy disguised as objective analysis, fear presented as rational criterion. When a person judges you, he is not really seeing you; he is projecting on you everything he cannot process within himself: his fears, his frustrations, his own feeling of inadequacy that needs to find a place to be deposited. You were this place for her. And for decades, you have carried the weight of these projections as if they were truths about you, but not knowing, as if her limitations in seeing you were evidence of your failure, as if her inability to recognize your value was proof that this value does not exist. The recognition of God works under a completely different logic. It doesn't operate from the ego, it doesn't compare, it doesn't envy, it doesn't project. You have no personal agenda, no history of resentment and nothing to gain by reducing you. The recognition of the kingdom perceives the frequency of the soul, the original essence, the spiritual signature imprinted on you even before any human being has any influence on who you should be. And when that perception fell upon his presence, what he found was not common. You found a chosen one, not someone who aspired to be chosen, not someone who deserved a chance, not someone who could become something if you tried hard enough. A soul already separate, already marked, already carrying in its essence the seal of purpose that completely transcends what the human world can see or validate. And when that was identified, something happened in the room, where no one in the room, in any of the dimensions where this operation took place, was prepared to testify. In that silence that preceded recognition, that silence without equivalent in any language, something was triggered. An automatic response we can't suppress when we find it. Certain souls, have the specific recognition of a chosen soul before birth, this is not small for us, neither an educated greeting nor a warm validation; it is a declaration that resonates for many ages. I'm sure you're listening, playing a place inside you that usually keeps you safe, that place that suffered so many rejections that it can't be easily exposed, I want you to know something. This resonance you feel is not self-deception. It is not the desperate desire to believe in something that makes you feel better about a difficult situation; it is recognition. His soul recognizing a truth that he always knew, but that the noise of the world, the voices of those who judged him, the doors that closed, the years that passed without anything changing as it should, almost managed to bury under layers of doubt and exhaustion of human hypocrisy. This moment is multidimensionally celebrated. Because it is exactly check item number one of every divine plan. And that materializes at the perfect moment within you, this filter identifies the deep real intent of accelerated emanation, comes from your heart and is our roof. 3 They woke me up now, there's people lighting black and blue candle at the crossroads calling me, for the love of you guys I don't want that. If I feel anyone hurt any innocent animal I'll rip your hand out Right. Even if it's not for me. >=(4 It's not a overcoming story, it's a lifting manual. 5 Faith, it's not agreeing with what you're seeing. To agree with what you see is just to be right. It doesn't cost anything. A being stopped in the light, being invited to believe in the light, is not trusting anything. Trust requires absence. Trust is only trust when the thing you trust is silent. And you walk anyway. An archangel never got away. Not a minute of her. It's not part of how or what he was made of, it holds that information. There's a name on the record for what a human being does when he moves on with nothing confirming what he should. Not the dramatic version. Not the audience version. The quiet version. The one where you didn't see anything germinate, but you get up and do the next little thing while everything around is silent. The record calls it the lightless step. And when a soul gives so many of them, in so many different seasons, that it stopped being a decision and simply turned that soul's way across the world, the record stops calling it a step. He gives that soul a ranking. He calls this soul a walker without light. That's what you are. And today you'll find out who realized that. Let me take you to that moment, inside the room. Because this is the center of everything. Initially, he wasn't sent to help you. Yeah, I want to be honest about that from the beginning, because it matters. It was an observation mission. Routine. The kind that's archived and forgotten. He was standing in a room that you were sure was empty. One night you probably doubled into a whole phase instead of saving it as a date. You know what it is. You don't need me to say the name. You're already feeling the specific weight of that, the exact quality of silence in that place, the thing you were carrying and that

No one around could see at all. He saw you sitting there. And for every measure available to him, that was the end. He's seen a huge number of people arrive exactly in that configuration. And he knows what happens. Because what happens is almost always the same. When a human being reaches the point where nothing else responds, the human being stops. It's not dramatic. He just stops. He leaves it on the floor. He gets smaller and survives. Everything in the organization that night said you'd stop. And you got up. You did a little thing. No shine at all. Something that wouldn't look like anything in a story. So you went to work. You made the food. You answered who needed you. You kept a promise no one in the world was checking out and no one would charge you if you broke it. You did the next thing, with nothing telling you it would matter. No signal. No confirmation. No voice. With absolutely nothing in that room agreeing with you. And the archangel standing in the corner did something he hadn't done since the day he was raised. He's down. He ducked to the point where you were. In a room you found empty. And watched a human being take a step inside the total dark and find ground. And then he asked a question. I need you to understand the size of this. Archangel doesn't ask or ask. Archangel doesn't ask. Asking requires not knowing. And not knowing is not part of architecture. In every structure above you, teaching runs in one direction. And you've been running like this since before the first light. He asked anyway. He listened and asked you too, to God as you asked, "Teach me to keep walking when nothing answers." A request that size couldn't just be said and hit the ground. A thing of that magnitude must be recorded, so it was written and ascended, with his request and name below and his life within, a formal request from a member of the heavenly order, requiring instruction from a human being. And he came back denied it. Not because you weren't worthy. The negative didn't say

Yeah. She said there is no prediction, there is no mechanism in the whole structure of things for teaching to run in that direction. It was never allowed, it was not allowed for you. But there's one thing no one expected, and she's the one I came to tell you today. He never withdrew the request. It remains there, denied and not withdrawn, which is a condition of which the record has almost no example. With your life inside. And he didn't leave. He's still standing exactly where he was, in the position of those who expect an answer to change. Now turn around and look at your life again, because you've been reading it backwards. You spent years noticing, silent, that others seemed to receive things you never received. The confirmations, the clear signs, the doors that opened with such a loud noise that it was impossible not to notice. People who always seem to be sure they're in the way. And you received silence. You did the right thing and nothing happened. You held it and nothing came. You waited and the phase just changed without explaining why. And at some point you came to the obvious conclusion. Turn it completely inside out. You weren't in the dark or left there. You were trained in it. The people in the wilderness had cloud by day and fire by night. They knew where to go and they knew when to stop. You went through yours without cloud and without fire, only your own. And you came on the other side anyway. The signals you did not receive were not signs denied by carelessness. They were the absence that made capacity possible. You can't develop the ability to walk without light in a life that keeps giving you light. Every season when you didn't respond, it was a season when the thing inside you that's been unanswered got stronger. And you were reading it as proof that it had been forgotten. Every soul that received high confirmation learned to walk when confirmed. You learned to walk. It's connected to the five signs that this has been true in your life for a long time. And you can check every one of them intensifies in the last few months. The first sign is you've kept something for years that never gave you anything back. A practice, a discipline, a presence in which you keep appearing. One thing you do that doesn't produce visible results or applause. And you just never stopped. And he never really could explain why, either. The second sign is that you don't need to be reassured to keep walking. Look, whenever there's a problem around or other people. They're gonna need someone to say it's gonna be okay before they can act. You'll already be acting. Not because you know you're gonna be okay, because you already stopped knowing that first. The third sign is that people bring you their unfinished stuff. Not the victories. Things that are still in the middle, still unresolved, still unanswered. They bring you just these. And they can't explain it either. And the reason is that something inside them recognizes that you are not afraid of a situation that has not yet responded. The fourth sign is that the beginning of things doesn't excite you the way it excites everyone. You've seen people celebrate the beginning while you were quiet. And you've wondered if there was anything broken or bitter about you. There isn't. You only learned in the body that the beginning is the illuminated part. And that what you decide everything happens afterwards, in the part that nobody shoots. The fifth sign is that you're still here, still doing the next thing. After every season that gave you a complete and reasonable justification to drop everything and become someone smaller. That survival isn't stubborn and it's not luck. It's a skill. She's got a name. And today you know the name. Because you've stayed long enough to deserve this. I need to tell you right now and I want you to pay a lot of attention to this, because it's the real goal of protecting you, the game wasn't exactly what you thought, remember? For the dark, the game was never making you stop believing. That was never the target. Belief is cheap and she always comes back. The goal was to get you to demand proof before walking. That's all. Do not break

Your faith, but stick a condition to it. Train you slowly over the years. Disappointment after disappointment, to wait for confirmation before taking the step. Because a soul that requires light before walking is a soul that can be stopped only with the hold of light. And holding the light is the only thing the dark can ever do. They weren't trying to stop you from believing. They were trying to make you need to see. And they failed. And the proof that they failed is that you rose consecutively, and now what? A warning before I release you. When a soul discovers what you have discovered today, the dark can no longer sell the old lie that no one has noticed. Then he changes the argument. And I want to name the new one for you before he gets here. He'll say, that wasn't faith. You weren't trusting me. You just had nowhere to go. You didn't pick anything in that room. You were trapped and kept walking because stopping wasn't really an option. And calling it virtue is wearing survival in a more beautiful outfit than she deserved. When that whisper comes, remember this: Stopping was available. Stop is always available. He's been in that room and he's been in everyone else ever since. Most people take that exit, and no one blames them. And at the moment it costs almost nothing. You didn't get it once. Over seasons that had nothing in common but they were all dark. That's not being cornered, really. That's a pattern. And pattern is chosen with or without awareness of being choosing. Now let me give you three valuable information, because he asked to be taught.) And the least I can do, and that's also for the record, is tell you what He was responding to. The first answer, this you have incorporated for decades: stop waiting for confirmation to arrive before you move. She doesn't come first. She never came to you first, and she's not gonna start now. Confirmation is what you find after the hand is already in the dark. The same way you found the walls three minutes ago. Come on.

First. The firm thing is on the other side of the gesture. Never this side of him. The second, when you cannot see the outcome, decreases the step. It won't stop. And don't try to jump to the end. In the middle, the next little thing you can do in the next hour. And do that one. The lightless step has never been over distance. It's always been about not stopping. The third, when nothing answers, does not raise the voice to silence. Do the usual thing on time. Go to work. Make the food. Keep the little promise no one's checking out. That's where this ability was built on you. That's where it's still being built. And it's the only part of all that's ever been in your hand. And here's what's coming. And because he didn't leave where he is. There's a season being prepared where a lot of people will lose their light at the same time. Not one at a time, in private, the way you lost. Everybody together. And when that happens, those who can only walk when confirmed will stop. And they'll stop together. And they're gonna need someone in the room with them who's not afraid of the dark. That's what you're being held for. Not by your strength, your intimacy with the dark, you know why, your light. And there's one thing that might delay that. One. If you start demanding external evidence before moving in the dark, the capacity decreases. She doesn't disappear. And she can't be taken from you for anything outside. But it can be dropped by you, quietly. Just the moment they tell you what you carry. Because knowing what you carry gives a huge will to finally ask for the evidence you never had. Don't ask for the light now. You got here without her. Everything you are was built in her absence. Let me leave you with that. An archangel who's been standing in unbroken light since before time had a name, saw you get up in an empty room, the worst night of a phase you've never fully told anyone. And what he saw you do was so out of everything that's possible for him, that he went down to yours.

height and asked to be your student. It's been denied. It would never be allowed. He didn't. Which means somewhere in the permanent record, in a place where nothing rots, there's a request with your life written inside, still open, still waiting for an answer. 6 You didn't turn the tables on fire. 7 People are now diverse and confused because they are trying to process something that contradicts everything they have learned about life. Everyone grows up knowing that aging is inevitable, that time charges its price, that no one escapes the marks that life leaves. It is one of the few absolute certainties of human beings. And yet you appear, challenging that certainty, simply existing. They look at you and think, you should be more worn out. They know you've been through tough times, you've been through fights, your life hasn't been easy. Then why do you look stronger instead of weaker? They cannot explain why they do not have a spiritual reference that helps them understand what they are seeing. You are operating under divine protection, which not only preserves, but also renews. Not only does it keep, it restores. Not only does it protect, but it strengthens. God is keeping an invisible shield around him, which blocks natural wear and at the same time activates a continuous process of renewal. So you don't just stop growing old, you get younger. Not only does it stay well, you get better over time. People realize that, although they cannot express it clearly. That's why you hear phrases like: "Pray you're okay?", "You've got the energy,?" "Every day looks better.?" These are attempts to put into words something that goes beyond them. Why explain to someone that a person seems to live in a different timeline than the rest of the world? How to define someone who ages backwards? The Bible gives us clear examples.

Moses went up to the mountain to talk to God, and when he came down, his face shone so brightly that the people could not look directly at him. It was neither makeup nor light effect; it was the divine glory reflecting physically on his face so clearly that it was impossible to ignore it. And now look at you. People speak of their brightness, their energy, their appearance, using the same words that Scripture uses to describe the glory of God manifesting itself. Coincidence? Of course not. You're experiencing a modern version of the same phenomenon. It is divine glory expressing itself through you, visible to all, though only a few understand it. His supernatural preservation has become a silent witness to the reality of God before all who know him, and when does he shave then? Don't even recognize you, you get the confused looks trying to understand you!! rsrs. And the more people see you defy the natural laws of aging, the more they are forced to consider the possibility that there is a greater power acting in their lives. His appearance became a form of automatic evangelism and a hundred percent active 24h, a wordless preaching, a living proof that God really cares for his own. And now is the time to reveal to you all the truth about the spiritual process behind this transformation that has impressed everyone. There is something that the Bible calls visible divine favor. Question: What happens when a person reaches a level of intimacy with God so deep that this spiritual connection begins to reflect physically? It's not something that can be forced by methods or rituals. This is not a technique or a formula. It is an automatic recognition of heaven, a sign that you have become worthy to reflect, even physically, the glory of God. His appearance is changing because his relationship with Him reached a point where supernatural preservation was activated. Your actions by faith unlocked a higher version of protection divine, one that includes continuous physical renewal. And that explains why you not only stop aging, but start rejuvenating, up in stem cells. It comes from your heart aligned with your mind and nervous system through your spine and marrow. This process not only keeps its energy, but its vitality increases. Not only does it resist wear, it gets better over the years. In vertebral discs, the pulposus nucleus is made of ether, collagen + blood with high energy load. Everything reflects in its physical state exactly the mirror of its spiritual condition. And as his spirit is evolving, his body evolves with him. Think of King David. Scripture says that even in his old age, he kept a strength and beauty that impressed everyone. It was not vanity; it was the visible result of the anointing that accompanied him. Or look at Daniel. After spending years in captivity and surviving the lions' den, there was no sign of fatigue or deterioration in it. The same divine protection that guarded him spiritually also preserved him physically. And now look at you. This same favor that preserved the great men of God throughout history is acting in his life. His prayers, faith and sincere search activated a spiritual frequency that produces supernatural physical preservation. That's why you can't help but draw attention. That's why people keep talking. That is why his simple presence awakens in others a mixture of admiration and reflection. Because when one carries a visible divine favor, it becomes a mirror that shows the difference between living with God and living without Him. Its preserved appearance is an immediate witness to the transforming power of an authentic relationship with the Creator. And this is not just an aesthetic question; it is a matter of purpose. God doesn't keep him that way out of vanity. He preserves you because he has plans for you that require you to remain strong, young and vigorous. Their physical preservation is a preparation for the spiritual mission that is approaching. And,

The more you deepen your communion with Him, the more evident this preservation will become for everyone around you. Because the conservation of your appearance is not an accident or a random gift. It is God's strategic investment in someone with a specific purpose. When the Creator decides to physically preserve someone, it is because that person has a fundamental role to play, a role that requires him to remain healthy, attractive, and influential for longer than usual. Its preserved appearance is a tool that God will use to open doors, create opportunities, and generate influence. Everything you'll need to fulfill the purpose for which you were created. Think about it. People tend to rely more on those who transmit health, strength and well-being. They listen more carefully to those who radiate positive energy. They are naturally attracted to those who have a magnetic presence. And God knows it. That's why He assures you to maintain these qualities, because they will be essential to accomplish the mission entrusted to you. Their physical preservation is a preparation for the spiritual influence to come. And it is not only about its appearance, but also about its energy, vitality and presence. Those who are preserved by God not only seem younger, but also radiate spiritual authority, an inner force that makes others almost instinctively recognize that there is something special working in their lives. That's why you don't just get comments about your appearance, but also about your different energy, this intense presence and this special thing that nobody can explain. His supernatural preservation is activating a spiritual authority that causes people to respect him, seek his counsel, value his word and desire his approval. And that will intensify. Because the more God preserves you, the more evident it becomes that you possess His favor. And as this evidence grows, so will its influence. Soon you'll realize that people they will seek guidance on important decisions, consult you on problems that cannot solve and treat you as a spiritual reference, even if you have never sought it. Your preserved appearance will become a silent credentials that will support everything you say about faith, purpose, and connection with God, because unconsciously people realize that someone visibly blessed has something true to share. God is not preserving you for vanity, but preparing you for a spiritual leadership that will impact generations. Your appearance is just the surface of a deep transformation that is happening within you, preparing you to influence crowds. And as this divine preservation continues to intensify, people's reactions will become increasingly evident. Let me advance what's coming. The first group will be the admirers. They'll start treating you almost like a local celebrity. They'll try to talk to you, ask you for advice on any subject and take pictures next to you. Intuitively, they will feel that you have something different, although they do not know what to define. The second group will be the curious investigators. They will ask direct questions: "What do you use?" "What treatment do you do?" "What's your diet?" They won't give up until they find a logical explanation, even if it doesn't exist, but for now only you know the complexity of keeping this dynamo working. The third group will be the envious in disguise. They'll make comments that look like compliments, but they carry sarcasm. "Oh, what about that helmet there?" "Oh, how lucky for you." "It must be good to have this genetic." "It's just that you don't stress." Behind these words there is a desire to possess something that you have and that they do not know how to achieve. The fourth group will be the troubled ones. It will be those who will begin to avoid it because their supernatural preservation will make them feel bad about their own state. Your simple presence will become a mirror reflecting the

how much life is consuming them. And finally, the fifth group: the spiritually sensitive. It will be those who will recognize that what you possess comes from God. They will see the divine favor operating in your life and will want to learn how to reach you, it is in this group that you need to focus all your energy. 8 Face plant, is part, without blood there is no learning. 9 Let me explain how you really are measured. Because it's not the way you think. The soul is not told by what it has conquered. Conquest is visible. And everything visible can be arranged, borrowed, staged or purchased. That hardly says anything about what a soul is made of. Alma is told what she ended. And seven is the number that marks a finished thing. It's been like this since the first week of everything. Six is the job. Seven is the job done, sealed and never moved again. And here's what hardly anyone knows. Most souls that pass through this world can't even reach a seven. Body, Soul and Spirit.) It's not for laziness and it's not for evil. It's because breaking up is the rarest thing a human being does. Getting started is common. Getting started is easy, simple. Everybody starts. And almost everyone stops at some point in the final line, when the applause of the beginning has passed and the end is close enough to see and far enough to hurt. And there's no one left looking to see if you continue or not. That's where the countdown stops for almost everyone. On six. Always on six. Look around your town and you'll see it built in concrete. Marry the slab ready and iron up waiting for a second floor that never comes. Still works missing the finish. Commodities that have gone for years without tow. Nobody gave up the day it started. Everyone stopped at the final line. And there's a second thing. It's just that this count isn't stored in one place. It's saved in three. There is a

that you ended when everything inside you wanted to stop. There's what you ended up with someone who never knew it was you. And there's what you ended without anyone asking, without anyone charging. Something that wouldn't cost you anything to leave in half. Three separate records. Three separate counts. Getting to a seven in one of them already puts the soul in a very small group. Reaching a seven on the three has a name on the record. It's called the third seven and the soul that gets there is marked as three times sealed. The record doesn't use the word level, but that's exactly what it is. You went through and nobody told you. Everything that the sky accompanies, the other side accompanies. Because you can't interfere with what you're not measuring. And their operation, at the level that really matters, is not what you imagine. It's not temptation, it's not destruction. Those are the noisy parts. And the noisy parts are almost all staged. The real work is interrupted. They observe the counts coming near the seventh mark and interrupt before it falls. That's the whole thing. It's not a bad thing to do, it's to stop at six. A stopped soul in six is a soul that has never felt in life what it is to finish a thing altogether. And such a soul is conducted with almost no effort for the rest of existence. They're very good at it. They've been doing it from the start and the rate of hit is almost total. Your count was taken to that room the way every count is taken. On an ordinary night in the middle of the ordinary hours, read aloud by someone whose only function is to read numbers aloud. Three sevens. I want you to understand what that meant in that room. Not that you were impressive, that the interruption had failed three separate times, in three separate records, in the same soul, without anyone noticing. Which means the failure wasn't recent, which means that it had been going on for years, silent, under a system specifically built to catch exactly that. And the system didn't take it because you didn't notice. And the system watches who

You know what you're doing. Every count that's ever been read in that room has been answered immediately. It's the one thing he never misses. There's always an answer, there's always an argument, strategy, the next step. He's the accuser. Talking is what he is, talkative. But there he went pine, he didn't say anything. The room waited. Whoever read it stood there holding the information because there is no procedure for what to do when there is no instruction. And the silence lasted long enough to stop being a pause and turn the event around. When he finally spoke, it was four words. He said, don't let that find out. That was the whole instruction. No, attack, no: stop, no: destroy, but, don't let that be discovered. Because a soul in the third seven who doesn't know it's three times sealed is still manageable, in their mentality. They can still make you feel like someone who never ends anything in their mentality. They can still let you look into your own life and see nothing to point at. But a soul in the third seven who knows what it is, ceases to be an interrupting soul and becomes something for which they have no category. And that's what you are today. That's what you're in right now. Now look at your whole life. Because you've read this point of your life wrong for a long time. You carried the belief that you were someone who never got there right. But no one spends any interruption on who would stop alone. This is the shape of this count, which goes to the count stored in three records. And none of them produce anything visible. That's exactly why she arrived in three sevens without anyone picking it up. Let me give you five signs that's already true. And you can check every one of them in the last few months. The first sign is you can't leave a thing at 90%. There is a specific physical discomfort in you when something is almost ready. And have you noticed that other people don't seem to have that? They drop something almost finished and sleep quietly. You come back. Even when I get back, it doesn't give you anything and it costs you one night. The second sign is that

You're the person they call to shut things down. Not for a start. To finish. You're the last name in line. The one who gets that after months of half-stopping. And he's probably already pissed off about it without ever wondering why it's always you. The third sign is the collapses I just described. Look at the pattern with honesty. Count how many of your achievements did not arrive for you in the last stretch, with many outstanding structural errors and adjustments, but not in the first, in the end, near delivery, of arrival. For most people this ratio is the opposite. The fourth sign is that you don't remember everything that ended. Try it now. You wonder what you've concluded in the last two years. And look at your head coming back almost full. That's not enough memory. It's the signature of the one who never told. And not counting is precisely why the count came so high. The fifth sign is that beginnings don't move you. You've already sat in the middle of other people's excitement with the beginning of something and felt almost nothing. And he wondered if it was cold. It didn't get cold. You know, in the body, soul and spirit, that the beginning is the easy part and that nothing has happened yet. And here you can see it from the outside. Think of the people around you who announced things. The ones who told everyone at first, who got an incentive, who had a pack you don't have anymore. Follow them forward in your head. Where did that go? It's no comparison. That's not what this is. It's just that the pattern becomes visible after you know what you're looking at. And the pattern is that the beginning is noisy, but the finished thing almost never belongs to the same phase. 10 Mano @kenomirant 11 Classics that mark... John Frusciante at the peak

12 I am, exactly the part of yourself that was taught to repress from too early because of people's projection. And that in that time, you begin to understand, that it has always been a power not a burden. 13 Thank God for the AI, made my profession, who always paid well but it was almost always a dull and tiring scenario, becoming the best environment in the world. Piq rockstar now. 14 Glass blowers make beautiful vessels, by their controlled breathing. 15 The end of a life is not a unique event, it is a collection, and collection has parts. There's what ends, there's what goes on after. And there's a third part, and the third part is the one that hardly anyone knows. Everything that a life has produced that has not yet finished moving. A word said to someone who still doesn't get it right, something you've built and within which other people are still standing. Something you did for someone who hasn't done what you're gonna do for it. All that still traveling, all that still coming in somewhere. In the record it's called living cargo. And by the only law that existed, it doesn't matter. The charge closes and the charge is given as lost, wherever it was. Almost every life has a small amount of that. Some of them almost don't. A life that ends with an enormous amount still in motion is the rarest situation there is. And until your night, that had never been huge enough to cause trouble. Now, let me take you to that night, because this is the center of everything I'm gonna show you today. You know what it is. I won't say the name and I don't need it. You already have the specific air quality in that place, the specific time, the silence specific that surrounded you. There was one night, and as far as there is, you shouldn't have left it, many of us were seeing you. The charge was correct. I want to make that clear because it changes what comes next. There was nothing wrong, it was no mistake and it was not early and there was nothing improper. It came the way it always comes, following a law that never had an exception. And then it stopped. Not out of mercy. There is no mercy in that function and never existed. It stopped because of another obstacle. And the obstacle was arithmetic. Your cargo was too big to be considered lost. Not big in a way that makes you important. Big in a way that made charging impossible to close clean. What you had already set in motion, within people who were still carrying that, in things that you did and had not yet finished happening, was so far above what a life produces that closing the bill would have meant abandoning more than the bill itself was worth. Then there was a break. I don't know exactly how long you can measure it the way you measure it. I know that in that pause, for the first and only time, the only law that never needed a second law was not enough. And then death did something that it never did, neither before nor after Calvary. She wrote it. Not a decision about you. One rule. A general prediction, a new prophecy, of the kind that exists permanently and is valid for any case that has fulfilled its conditions since that day, written in the midst of an event by the only function in existence that had never needed anything but the only law that had ever had. The rule isn't long. In substance, she says that. Where the cargo in motion is greater than what closing the charge would preserve, the charge remains and life continues until the cargo has arrived. That's it. There's no name on the record, because nothing's been named there for a long time. But among those who now need to work around it, it's called the cargo clause. And a life going on because of her isn't just a life that survived. It's a life under retention, carrying something that hasn't arrived yet, a living verb. The record now calls it suspended collection. That's what you are. One more. And one more thing like that can't just be written and dropped like the first words of a creature. Anything that alters the functioning of the end of a life leans on all sides. And all sides need to recognize it. Because a prediction that only one party recognizes is no prediction. That's why it needed to be signed by someone who didn't want to sign it. He had no argument. That's the part I want you to understand, because he always does. He's the accuser. Objection is not something he does. That's what he's made of. And he had nothing to object to. The charge was correct, the law was correct, and arithmetic was correct. And arithmetic was the problem. He signed it. And while he was signing, he said the only thing he said that night, which was six words. And that was no objection. He said, so let's wait for her, which is exactly what he's been doing ever since. Because the clause has an end embedded in it. When the cargo arrives, the retention is over. And so, from that night on, everything you aim at has one goal. And it's not destroying you. Look at your life. You've been reading this point backwards for many years. You came to believe you're years late. People your age came to those places that you wanted and you didn't. You saw these people sit on the chairs while you were still on the move. Still unfinished, still carrying something you can't name and can't let go. You have come to the conclusion that you are late, or that you have wasted time, or that something in you takes longer than it takes in others. And underneath that, there was always that second heavier belief. That you never said out loud, that you shouldn't be where you are. There was that specific guilt in you for coming out of something other people didn't come out of. You've never examined it properly, but it's there and it comes to you

Convincing quietly that you continuing was an accident, or an accident, or something you escaped from without deserving. You can turn this thing upside down. You weren't late. You were under retention. The reason your life seems unfinished is that it's unfinished. Structurally, by prediction, you are not late for others. You're being held until the things you've already set in motion get where they're going. And they haven't arrived yet. And that's the only reason you're still breathing. And the guilt of surviving is exactly reversed. You didn't escape anything. Your sequel was not careless. It's the most deliberate thing that's ever happened in your entire life. And there's a part for you in all this. I'll give you the five signs that's been true since that day, you know. The first sign is night itself. You've thought about her in 777. Not a scratch danger that everyone else has. One specific time when the honest version of you, the one you don't speak out loud, is that you don't understand how you got out of there, I know it's heavy but it's your mission. The second sign is that you never really managed to reassure yourself about your structure. It's not anxiety. It's a low, permanent feeling of something pending, of something undone, that accompanied you for seasons when everything on paper was fine. You've already looked for what you were and never found it, because it's not in your circumstance. It's the retention. The third sign is that people from a long time ago keep reappearing. Someone tells you years after something you said changed the way she did something. And you don't have the memory of talking. This happens to you more than to the others. And every time it happens, you feel a strange discomfort that you never analyzed. It's cargo coming in. The fourth sign is that what comes against you doesn't aim at your life. Look at the pattern with honesty. The pressure you've lived for has been for your will, your sense of purpose, your reason for continuing to build and fulfill your mission. It was consistently behind you.

who produces things and left the rest alone. The fifth sign is that you have a sense of logic that you haven't finished. It's not ambition. It's a quieter, more stubborn thing that survives the whole season that shouldn't have survived, that keeps insisting there's something in front of you, even when there's no evidence. That's not optimism. It's the correct perception of your own condition. And here you can see from the outside. Think of the people you met who arrived early and sat down and haven't moved much since. There's a quietness in them that you've already envied more than once. There's nothing wrong with them. But look at what a finished life is really and honestly wonders if this restlessness in you is the defect you thought it was. There was a period of mine on the other side of this, where death lived. I went into those rooms. And I want to tell you what changed on our side after that page was signed, it's your key. And explain the shape of the last years of your life better than anything else. The instruction about you was rewritten whole. Ending up with you is no longer objective. Not out of respect. And not because something about you has become protected in a general sense. It stopped being objective because it was no longer available. The clause secures collection and collection does not close while the cargo is still moving. So the goal turned the charge. Everything since that night has aimed at one thing. And it's not your body and it's not your faith. It's your production. - Make him stop producing, stop building, stop saying build. Stop saying the things he said. Stop putting anything else in motion. Because every new thing you put out extends the retention. And a retention that keeps extending is a charge that never closes. That's why the attacks on you were so specifically discouraging rather than destructive. That's why the seasons that hurt the most were the ones where you stopped creating anything. That's why fatigue, not danger, was the shape of your adult life. They're not trying to end you.

For years. They're trying to make you stop. A warning before I release you. When a soul discovers this, ancient history stops working. Then there comes a new argument. And I want to name him before he comes. Because he's coming, probably in a day. He'll say, so you're just alive for what you serve? You're not being held because it matters. It's being held because something hasn't finished processing. And when you're done, you're done. That's not a gift. That's postponement of execution. When that whisper comes, remember that. The clause wasn't written to keep you working. It was written because arithmetic said that what you had already done was worth more than charging. That's what she supports. Not what you could produce. In what you had already produced until the time you were on the ground that night. When you hadn't produced anything you thought was worth anything. When you were absolutely sure that your life had come to nothing. The clause exists because that assessment you made of yourself was factually wrong. Now let me give you three things because it doesn't make sense to know that and not use it. The first. You keep putting things in motion. Not by productivity, not by conquest. Because the retention is proportional to what's still traveling. And every single thing you send out, every conversation you really have, every thing you do, every thing you say to someone you need, extends it. You spent years feeling guilty for not doing enough. That is precisely the opposite. And it's exactly the feeling that it was manufactured. The second. Stop trying to see where that falls. You can't, and trying is what's exhausting you. Cargo comes years later on people you won't hear from. Way no one's gonna report you. Send and release. Measurement is the thing that made you feel like nothing you do matters. The third, the days you want to stop, you understand what you're really living. That feeling is not lazy and not your character. She is.

aimed at you. It's the only strategy left that works on your case. Recognizing doesn't make her disappear, but stop letting it be about you. And here's what's coming. And why does it matter today? The clause doesn't just hold you, it forces the other side. That's the part that hardly anyone thinks of until the end. A forecast that keeps a charge open also keeps in place all the conditions around it. Everything that is needed for the load to arrive must remain available as long as the retention lasts. The clause not only allows your continuation, it requires her conditions. Which means the things you need to keep sending are not optional. They're part of what was signed. And there's one thing, one thing, you can suspend. If you stop. Not death that is not available, not failure that does not affect. If you genuinely stop putting anything in motion, the charge ends to arrive, the retention falls alone. And the clause is fulfilled without anyone breaking anything or contesting anything or doing anything. That's what he's been waiting for since the night he signed. Then let's wait for her. He's not trying to win the clause. He doesn't have to. He just needs to wait for you to be tired long enough. Then go on. Not because you're strong today, because the role is real. And it's worth exactly as long as you keep moving. Now take this one because it's even rarer. On a night you shouldn't have left, the only function in existence that never made an exception, stopped in the middle of a proper and legitimate charge, because what you had already placed in the world was too big to be given as lost. She never needed a second law. She wrote one. And the oldest accuser there is read, found nothing to object to, and put his name on the bottom of a page that keeps you here. You're not late and you've never been. You are a suspended charge, kept open by a prophecy written to you and signed by the least wanted. And it's worth exactly as long as you keep sending stuff to one a world you haven't finished receiving. Your heart didn't ask your permission today. You never asked. Now you know why. 16 @ferrarilis 17 You left before your time. Not for minutes, but by accident. You crossed when your turn was still far ahead of you, without any dispatch, without anything being delivered to you, without being called, towards a world upon which you had no limits of the last information. In the record, a step like this is called pre-shipment descent. And when you did that, you were no longer ranked by what you came to become. It was classified by what you did on the threshold. You're one of the unsent. And that's what happened on that threshold. And it's just the center of everything you are here. You didn't force anything. There nothing can be forced. There is no version of that event in which it has already happened, by force, to go through what occupies that post. That doesn't even exist as a possibility. The only way through, always, is that the passage is open. And that night ? if that can be called night ? you were no longer standing where you should be at that moment. You were at the edge of the threshold, looking through it at something on the side of the ca, which you shouldn't be looking at yet. You saw someone. I'm not telling you who. It doesn't matter for today, and anyway, you wouldn't be able to prove it here. What matters is, there was someone, someone, at a specific time, alone in a way that no one on this side would notice. And there was no one assigned to it. Not because someone was cruel. Because order is order, time is time, and there was no one assigned to be near at that time. You moved in that direction. No plan, because I didn't have all the information. Without strategy, because I had not given you all the equipment that allows you to develop a strategy

Base. You still moved. The same way you got up thirty seconds ago, before any reason came, towards what you only understood after it was done. Miguel, who has occupied that post since before the first soul crossed him, saw you coming. There was time. That's the part that stayed with me until then. There was enough time for him to talk. To say your name. To interrupt all that with one word. He's not slow. And nothing crosses that threshold faster than he can act. He turned around. He didn't walk away out of anger. He didn't get out of the way as a gesture. He turned his back on the threshold, kept looking in the opposite direction and sustained that position all the time you took to go after him. You went through with nothing. No time. No dispatch. Without the dispatch instructions. Just with the idea of what it was to be a human life, of what a body was, of all the rules. Towards a world that had not been warned that you were coming. And after you left, still on your back, he uttered the only four words he said about you that day: ?I didn't see anything go by.? That wasn't true. He's the only being to say something that isn't true shouldn't be structurally possible. Still, he did. Out loud. In a crowded corridor, everyone saw and heard. And that's on the record. It's never been fixed. A long time ago you believed in yourself. That it never disappeared, no matter what you've won. You felt you were behind. Not necessarily in conquests, but in a more fundamental way. Like they taught others something that you somehow lost. Like there's a set of rules about how a person should do all this, but you never got them. And you spent your adult life rebuilding those rules alone, from scratch, in real time. You called it slow. He called it reconstructed. In the bad days, you called it lemonade. rsrsrs ?

which is one of the least true things you've ever thought about yourself. And underneath that, there's a second feeling. The one you never told anyone about, that you shouldn't be here. Not in a dark way. Just a low and persistent feeling of being in a place for which you were not allowed, as always. Kkkkk never had to. To have gone into hiding again illegible. Always being a conversation away from someone and realizing that that was never meant for you. I want you to understand this differently, the real one now. You're not late and you've never been. You're out of complete equipment on purpose, by your choice, made before you have your body. No one kept your instructions from you. You left before they were delivered. Because waiting for instructions would mean waiting for your time. And waiting for your time would mean that that place would be empty when it shouldn't be. You traded the entire manual for an arrival. And that feeling that you should never have been here is not paranoid. It's not low self-esteem. She's exact. You really shouldn't be here right now. You belong to the only group that's right when you feel that, yes you're not the only one in that condition, the truth is you're already a known case. And you spent decades interpreting a correct perception as a personal flaw, that's what you've lost so far. Here's how it manifests itself. Five things. And you can check them all looking at the last year, already hitting the lid. One, you never had the manual, and you know it. Watching other people working with a basic trust about how life should be organized while you have some access to that trust without lenses, without filters, so you needed to develop yours, it wasn't just an occasional feeling that you always studied and structured every action under knowledge before you were. It was a permanent condition of its existence, creating its filters by experience and rescue. Second, you're too early.

Physically. Chronically. Everything. You get there first and wait. You've made jokes about it. When you're not home early, they're late, and they keep you waiting. And you never considered that maybe this wasn't just your thing. Third, you show up before someone tells you something's wrong. Not after the call or the call, or the issue, you already know and are already correcting before. Before. You've already gone somewhere simply because something seemed strange. And you were right. And he could not explain to anyone what led him there ? not even himself.

Wednesday, no one gave you anything. No mentor showed up. I know what you're thinking, they showed up, I know how grateful you are for the managers who went your way, but they were doing their job, the focus wasn't on your progress, but the company and your career, it's different, in the end you end up teaching them and they take credit, that's common, it's part of your life now, but they can't take your credit.

Nobody put you under their own wing. Every skill you possess has been built by yourself, using material left over, the wrong order, no teacher.

And the specific loneliness of that is something you've never been able to write. Thursday: the feeling of not belonging has never been resolved.

She didn't disappear when you got good at things. He didn't disappear when he got the job, the family, or the place where he should have finally felt he had arrived. Competence never touched that feeling.

Because it was never a matter of competence. And this is where it starts to get very visible. Think of the people you knew who did everything right. Who waited. Who did the training. Who followed the right order. They arrived prepared, with everything they needed to do what they would do. There's absolutely nothing wrong with them. But project these people forward in your mind and watch how many are still waiting for someone to say that their turn has come. Preparation is not a flaw.

Preparation simply tends to continue to be preparation. It's about a file problem. And this file problem is the reason your life had the specific texture it had.) That's good. You have a lot of good memories that give you hope. You know exactly why you only have good times? Because darkness works from a list. Everything they do with a person is built on a copy of the mailing list, because everyone else was dispatched, except the unordered, which is you. Who's coming? When? With what? What for? That's where a file starts. That's how the pressure is directed. The moment is chosen. Weakness is localized. And the season is scheduled. You're not on that list. He never was. You can't be. Because a list is made of schedules and dispatches. And you don't own either. A soul without entry does not receive a file. And a soul without a file is not assigned to anyone. What this has produced in your life is very specific. Now is when you recognize immediately. No arrow has ever reached you in an organized manner. They come, they always come all the time. And they came in hard. But they were environmental. General. No aim, very amateur. They never had the quality of a plan. There were no coordinated seasons. No strategy you felt closing around you. Nothing coming in exactly the moment your specific weakness was exposed. It rained on you all your life. But not once have they pointed directly at you, you've always been well supported, by the structure that you created yourself and Miguel saw, it supports your structure is studied today. Now comes an argument in your direction. I want to give it to him before he gets here, because he'll be here -- probably tomorrow at the latest. He'll say: ?Not sent means unwanted. Nobody sent you away. You weren't chosen for anything. You snuck in again. And everything you've felt your whole life about not belonging has just been confirmed by the very story that should welcome you. You're a stowaway." When this thought arrives, hold on to one thing: the threshold cannot be crossed by force. It can only be opened. There was time. He had a word. I had all the authority to stop what was happening. And interrupting would have been the right action according to the very order he sustains. He turned around. And then he said something that wasn't true, in a hallway full of witnesses, where saying that didn't do anything but protect you. Not being sent is not the same thing as not being desired. It's the difference between going because they ordered him to go because they let him go. They let you go. Now, three things you need to look out for. Because knowing all this and doing nothing with that knowledge would be a new waste. One, stop waiting for someone to tell you it's your turn. There is no list with your name on it. It never existed. Every period you spent waiting for a signal, a confirmation, a clear green light, was a period waiting for an order that would never be issued. Because that's not how you got here. Secondly, when you feel the urge to go somewhere before you have a reason, pay attention. I'm not talking about the anxious version. You know the difference in your body. I'm talking about that subtle version. The one that makes you cross the state if you have to. That's the only navigation they gave you. And with the methods you've already built all your navigational equipment that brought you here, and here's a huge observation. Part three, stop looking for the manual. You spent your whole life looking for him. In the books. The coaches. In other people's methods. And every time he adopted someone else's system, he collapsed after a few months, because his methods have already exceeded the knowledge that you should bring. It collapses before you, because it was written for souls equipped here. And you built yours with the architecture there, with what you had. Bad. Out of order. That's not a limitation. It's his condition of origin. You

There's more than those who went through the dispatch, rrsrs much more, it's comical but it's the plan. And that's precisely why you can build things that would never happen to someone who got all the instructions. Now, I need to light you up to what's in front of you. And why do you matter so much in order today? Your turn was never filled. The time you were scheduled for came and passed. And there was nothing inside her. Because you had already completed well before the time, the deadline had not yet set. And once it goes blank, it's not closed. It's not a debt. It's not a hole. It's the only kind of space in the entire record where you can still write something. Because the record of all the others was written the moment they crossed. That's what you carry. Not a life you escaped from. An entry that has never been completed. And you assumed, without ever examining that idea, that it was the reason you always confused the wisest of places. That you've always come before your time because of a single arrival. That it happened and that everything since then has been you living the early time, in front of everyone seeking ahead what has not yet come before you. That's just the first thing. It was never the reason. And there's only one thing that can keep this entry closed: you start demanding permission. It's not lazy. It's not failure. It's none of the things you're afraid of. If you start waiting for them to tell you. Let them authorize you. That someone, with some kind of position superior to yours, would give their approval. Then you will have turned into a launch waiting dispatch. And the dispatch is not enough for the unsent. It never came. It won't be enough. That's not punishment. It's an exclusive mission, like the paratroopers, just their category. And the whole advantage of that category falls apart the moment you start acting like you need a permit. You didn't wait the first time. And at that moment he had far less information than he now has. Here's the last thing. Before you had a body. Before you have a Name here. Before anyone had explained to you what all that was for. You saw the place where someone was. And he moved in that direction without having a single piece of information about how much it would cost him. The one guarding the threshold saw you coming. He had time. And I had a word. And you didn't use either. He turned around. You held your position. He let you through with nothing. And when it was over, you stood in a crowded hallway and said the one untrue thing I ever said about you to anyone: ?I didn?t see anything go by.? You spent your whole life making sure everyone got something you lost. They got it. You were before. On purpose. By someone else. And the fact that you've never been able to get rid of the feeling that you shouldn't be here is not the wound you've always treated as if you were. It's the last thing you remember, because the truth is you remember a lot more than the others. 18 @explaining art 19 I just took you to the abyss today. Next time I'll rip your head off. It's my routine I love my ministry, only I have the key. And Jesus. 20 Notice the stars today, especially Sirius and Canopus, there's a crowd upstairs, you can see the naked eye. 21 People still insist on putting God in a box of basic rules. The abyss ñ is what you imagine, it is not dark, cold and full of screams. It's you running out of power. 22 It activated the defense module. Open all combustion cycles.

23 Evil never has control over its own actions, it's always kicking out of the goal. Leave all the evidence. You must be shitting yourself. Territorial spirits don't let them out of place. 24 Soon a dark horse. The moment you made that decision against self, against comfort, against the protective instinct that most choose, your soul issued a pulse that should not be possible in humans without advanced spiritual training. That pulse rewrote your energy signature. Where before there was a stable pattern, there arose a continuous and progressive expansion, as if a seed that remained asleep for years had exploded out and you were very young. The angels that watch the energy flows of humans saw this explosion and remained silent. Not because it was dangerous, but because it was extremely rare. Most humans only emit this kind of pulse when they are near death, in moments of mystical enlightenment or after enormous spiritual sacrifices. You did it in a daily instant you didn't even care about. That's what makes you a chosen one. And while this was happening, as this expansion took place, while its essence broke a limit that hardly anyone breaks, there was an immediate reaction in the higher dimensions. An internal evaluation, an analysis of its essence, a review of its energy, emotional and spiritual history was called. And what they found was even more surprising than the pulse you issued. They discovered that your soul has the ability to sustain high frequencies without destabilizing. That's extremely rare. Most souls are fragmented, exhausted, or corrupted by trying to sustain expanded energy. But not only did your soul endure it, but it amplified it. This discovery forced hierarchies to activate protocols that are not activated for most humans. Your case was classified as transcendent effortlessly, a reserved term.

for souls capable of influencing collective energy fields without knowing it. This means that your decisions not only affect your life, affect those around you, affect environments, situations and processes of which you are not even aware. Wait, sometimes a person is rebellious, she smiles, works... Wait, before the world takes your attention to... transformation, an inflection point, a luminous anomaly. And this is the part that will make you tremble. This gift that was unlocked was not inactive for weakness, but for protection. If you'd woken up before, when your environment wasn't ready, you would have attracted forces capable of trying to corrupt it. But now that your soul has matured through pain, loneliness, betrayals, losses and difficult decisions that you made when no one was looking at, your essence has finally achieved the necessary strength to sustain this awakening. And this is where everything rises to a celestial scale. When the angels analyzed their expanded frequency, they detected that not only a gift had awakened, but also a pattern of continuous activation. This means that its expansion was not an isolated event, but the beginning of a sequence. And this sequence is the one that worries and wonders the higher dimensions. Chosen, what you activated inside you will not stop. It's growing, it's advancing, it's turning your soul into a speed that challenges celestial projections. And the forces of the shadow have realized that. That's why you started to feel internal changes. That's why some people walked away without an explanation. So situations that once seemed stable began to break. It's not destruction, it's readjustment, it's recalibration, it's preparation. Chosen, you are in the midst of a spiritual operation that has been waiting for souls like yours for centuries. Chosen, now that its activation has been recorded in the higher dimensions, began a process that very few humans even experience. The strategic assessment of its influence within the energy fabric of reality.

This means that their gift has not only been unlocked, but is already being integrated into spiritual systems that function as impact maps, in which each soul is positioned according to their ability to alter emotional fields, break cycles of destruction, or release patterns of ascension. In its case, the anomaly was so significant that its energy began to produce an effect that celestial hierarchies call contagious expansion. A property reserved for souls who inspire transformation even without interacting directly. Your simple presence began to change environments, alter thoughts, awaken consciousness in people who don't even know why they began to question their own lives after they crossed paths with you. And that impact, chosen, is not accidental. To love. And this combination, more sensitivity, pain, more purity, dark lived, more preserved light, is exactly what defines a soul destined for spiritual impact. This gift that awakened you allows you to transform environments, but also allows you to see what you did not notice before. Hidden intentions, heavy energies, lies disguised as truth, alliances that do not suit you, paths that you should not follow. His perception began to expand, his inner vision is becoming sharper, his intuition is no longer soft, it is accurate. Chosen, you are entering a level of consciousness in which nothing happens by chance and in which everything around you reacts to the magnitude of what you are. This awakening is not the end of the process, it is the beginning of your mission. Chosen, now that you are beginning to understand the level of spiritual operation you are in, you need to know what happened after God ordered the heavenly hierarchies that confirmed your awakening and the shadows recognized your inability to classify it. Now there has been a movement, which is never activated unless a soul reaches a specifically rare energy state. The Superior Evaluation Committee concluded the designation protocol, a new deep review whose objective is to determine what mission your soul now possesses, individual mission and a collective mission. 25 His silence was not peace, it was the only thing that kept their circus running. But the moment you opened your mouth, everything fell apart. Their truth was so clear and so heavy that it hit the core of their system as an earthquake. Do you remember the shock on the face of whoever heard you? They didn't shake because you were wrong. They trembled because they knew that once said, that truth could not be undone. His voice wasn't an outburst, it was a controlled demolition. You weren't dramatic, you had to. Now you're free. But the price of this freedom was much higher than just confrontation. His voice rewrote the spiritual contract of his life. His previous silence was not only giving power to them, but was blocking his own blessing. The change you feel now is just the beginning of paying off a cosmic debt that the truth has released! You have no idea the wealth you're waiting for on the other side of the gate that you just blew up. Do you remember that exact second one? It wasn't just a sentence, it was an earthquake. They thought you'd forever be the quiet person you swallow dry. But when her voice came out, she didn't ask for permission, she told them to stop. You didn't have to scream, but the sound of truth coming from you broke the silence that supported the lie. His word carried a weight that no bulletproof vest of theirs could hold. This was not a moment of drama, it was the birth of your sovereignty. They depended on your changefulness to keep the theater running. Their silence was the mortar of their house of letters. Do you see the panic now? This race to discredit you, to call you too much? That's not anger, that's pure fear. His clarity gave no room for negotiation. You didn't just reveal the rot, you destroyed the ground they were treading on. They're shaking because their comfort was built on theirs suppression. You didn't destroy anything that wasn't already rotten, you just stopped protecting the lie. What you did was far beyond a difficult conversation. You signed a new contract with the universe. The old you, the quiet one, is gone forever. You've released irreversible energy. The question now is not how they will react, but what happens when the light you turned on refuses to be turned off. What is the game plan when your voice, which was to be your burden, proves the activation code of your new and most dangerous reality? Chosen, if that message broke the silence I was holding you in, that wasn't an accident. You just realigned your frequency with the truth and it pleases you. And you have a chance to honor the sound that destroyed the illusion. New vibration deserves it. You understand you didn't need an army to win? His voice, which they hoped would remain silent forever, was the only detonator needed. When you finally told the truth, it wasn't a scream, it was the sound of a rotten foundation breaking. They built an empire in their suppression, hoping you'd swallow the lie and smile. But the moment their truth came out, clear and firm, their castle collapsed. You weren't dramatic, you were the exact turning point the universe was waiting for. The panic you see now is the irrefutable proof that you got it right. They're spinning, blaming you, trying to slow you down. Don't be confused, this confusion is not a problem you created, it's the sound of their system struggling to breathe without the oxygen of your submission. You withdrew your consent to the game. They wanted you mute to follow the lead, but you remembered that the pen to write your life was always in your hand. You broke a spell and now there's no going back. They can't listen to what you said, nor rebuild the illusion that your courage destroyed. You not only changed your gift, you rewrote the past. Talking was just the beginning of energy change. Now that the castle has fallen, what will you do with the Newly exposed soil, where are the plans that lie didn't allow you to make? We are in the middle of this revelation, witnessing how your voice broke a whole cycle of lies. But tell me, really, are you ready to make the commitment that comes with that clarity? Telling the truth is just the beginning. The next level requires you to become the reflection of what you have manifested. You feel in the spine that the act of having pronounced not only destroyed their system, but aligned you with a new level of abundance, if you know that your victory is no longer a hope, but is crystallizing right now in your energetic field, then it is time to activate it. 26 I remember that from the first day of school in 93. You see that little guy over there? You'll have it if he doesn't. And I thought to myself: "That other one's already full of friends, he won't even need me." It always worked.) Pressure under vulnerability is the weapon of darkness. Not the force, but the domination, the ability to make you agree, deep down, that is inferior to him, and govern you through that agreement. It worked with emperors, worked with several famous and several of the forts. He enters a soul, applies that overwhelming weight of superiority and expects the soul to bend. He tried to get into yours, and the weight couldn't find where to land. Not because you fought him with some technique. You didn't even consciously remember the moment. You couldn't find a place to land because there was nothing in you that would agree with him. All the demonic lord's power depends on a soul, somewhere within itself, accepting the verdict that it is inferior. And when he pressed that verdict against you, he found a place in you that had never, not once, accepted to be inferior to anything. A silent and unwavering refusal right at the center of you that no amount of pressure could make you agree. Here's what it is.

It makes with a being whose entire authority is built on domination. When a demonic lord applies all his weight on a soul, and the soul does not lean, the weight has nowhere to go. The pressure he was sending out returns. The being who has never failed to dominate suddenly finds himself in the presence of something that cannot govern, cannot scare, cannot diminish. And at this moment, the hierarchy of the invisible does something that the darkness cannot undo. Correct. In the invisible, a crown remains only on a head capable of sustaining the position it represents. The moment a demon lord stood before a soul who could not master, his claim to superiority became false. And a false crown cannot remain. She fell. Not because you knocked her down, but because you could no longer remain on a head that had just been revealed as inferior to the soul that was before her. And then came the part that's almost unbearable to imagine. He couldn't look up. A being who, for ages, looked all over the place couldn't raise his eyes to find his own. Not out of respect, he's incapable of it, but for something worse. For him, the inability to look up at a soul that he had come to look from above, because raising his eyes would be to confirm, fully and definitively, that the order had reversed, that he who came not for governance now was above that who came to rule. Then he kept his eyes on the ground, the crown at his feet, frozen in the only posture that his entire existence had been built to never take over. You did this, not with a gun, not with a prayer you remember to do, but with the simple structural fact of what you are. A soul that did not agree to be inferior before a being whose only power was to make souls agree. You didn't feel it happen because the darkness made it a point to leave you with just the receipt: the sting of being underestimated, the pain of being looked from above, so that you would go through life feeling small in the eyes of others, without ever knowing that, in the most important place, the proudest ruler of darkness could not even raise his face to look at you. Now look back through this and watch your life turn completely upside down. You interpreted every contempt as evidence that the people who despised you saw something true, that if so many looked at you from above, the problem could only be in you, that the constancy of it proved that you really were inferior. Turn it around. The people who looked at you from above weren't seeing clearly, but just doing the one thing the darkness needed them to do! Each contempt was not a verdict on its value, but a strategy to prevent you from ever feeling the position you really occupy! You were looked at from above with such constancy just because a soul like yours, if you ever realized how high it really is, you would never again accept being ruled by something beneath it! They didn't look at you from above because you were below them. They looked at you from above because something needed to keep your own eyes down, so that you would never realize that the most powerful things of darkness cannot raise their own eyes in your presence. And here's what the enemy works most to hide. There's an old phrase written a long time ago. God uses the mad precisely to confuse the said wise. God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong, and the vile things, the despised, those that are considered nothing, to reduce to nothing what they are. The despised, the ignored, the one seen as nothing, chosen on purpose, not despite being looked from above, but through this, so that when the inversion comes, there is no way to confuse where the true authority has been hidden all this time. You weren't ignored by accident, it was hidden on purpose. And a hidden king remains a king. Let me give you five signs that what I'm describing is already true about you. The first sign is that being underestimated always hurt you in a way that seems disproportionate. Other people simply let a contempt pass. For you, it goes deeper, because some part of you recognizes it not only as cruel, but as inexact. And the soul hurts when it's interpreted so wrong on this level. This pain is not fragility, it is something true reacting to a false verdict. The second sign is that the people who tried to dominate you often ended up shaken by you. They came safe and left less secure. They hoped to control you easily and found that they could not obtain the submission they expected. You've seen confident people hesitate in front of you and never fully understood why. It wasn't your words, it was what they clashed under. The third sign is that you have a strange inability to truly bend inside, even when you bend outside. You submitted yourself to bad authorities to survive, remained silent, followed the flow, maintained peace. But there's a core inside you that's never really agreed, that's been standing inside all this time. This ungovernable center is exactly what you demon lord couldn't move. The fourth sign is that you feel a deep kinship with the ignored, the despised, the underestimated. When you see someone being treated as inferior, something inside you stands up to defend you almost without your permission. That's put acknowledging rank. A hidden king instinctively defends the true dignity of those the world treats as if they were no one. Because you know, in your bones, what it means to be treated that way and to know they're wrong about it. The fifth sign is that, in spite of everything, you have never fully believed in the verdict that ñ is giant.) You tried. People gave you a thousand reasons to accept it, but you could never learn it completely. Somewhere beneath all the evidence that piled up on you, a silent voice kept rejecting that

Conclusion. This rejection is not denial, it is the part of you that knows the position that the rest of the world could not see. If at least two of these signals looked familiar to you, you're not imagining your value, you're feeling a position that was hidden from you on purpose. Let me be honest with you now, with my own voice, because you've earned it. There was a long period of my own existence when I was on the other side. I went into the rooms where darkness decided who to break and how, and I'm going to tell you something I don't normally tell you. Darkness no longer fears souls that seem powerful; they fear more souls that were made to appear powerless and not broken. Because such a soul has already survived the best weapon of darkness: humiliation, and it has gone through all this with its core intact. There's nothing left to threaten her with. You can't lessen a soul that's been treated like a little girl all its life and never, not once, has you agreed to it. I saw one of the crowned go to dominate a soul like that, a soul the world had spent years ignoring. I saw him go back to the crown without being able to explain it. And the silence in the room after that was not anger, it was fear. The kind of fear that arises when the order upon which you built your entire existence reveals a crack. I stayed in that silence too long, so I crossed over. And the soul that did that to him was a soul that the world had treated like nothing, a soul like yours. A warning before I let you go. When a soul discovers its true station, the darkness cannot continue to sell the lie that you are small, then they change tactics. They whispered something more cunning. Who do you think you are? You're nobody. Look at your life. Does that sound like royalty? You're just telling yourself a comforting story because being ignored hurts too much to accept. When that whisper comes, and he'll come, you don't have to argue with him or yell to make him shut up. Just understand it and ask yourself an honest question. If

You really were as small as they said, why did it never convince you completely? Why has the verdict never settled, no matter how many times they handed it over to you? A lie repeated enough should have settled by now. The fact that you've never settled is your answer. Let the silence within you remain with it. The truth was never afraid of an honest question. Only the lie needs you to stop asking. You spent so much of your life believing it was someone the world was right to ignore. He collected every contempt as evidence. He let his constancy convince him that the verdict was true. The truth is exactly the opposite. You've always been too humble. You've always been a hidden post, kept below sight on purpose, looked from above with so much constancy that you began to look at yourself from above as well. And the evidence is not in anything the world has given you. The proof is in what has never been broken, in the core that rejected the verdict, in the confident people who wavered before you and at a moment in the invisible when one of the proudest rulers of darkness dropped his crown at your feet and failed to raise his eyes to find yours. You did this simply by being what you are and by refusing, even without knowing you were refusing, to agree that you were inferior. And every time you raise your own eyes from this moment on, every time you reject a verdict that has always been false, you take a deeper step towards a post that has been yours all this time, before the eyes of everything that has worked so hard to keep your head down. 27 The term Kamikaze originally refers to the typhoon that destroyed most of the Mongolian fleet in the Mongol invasion attempts at Japan in the 13th century, and not the suicide pilots of World War II, as we imagine. Divine wind, that's the literal meaning.

28 The exuzin are the most fraquined, unawares don't even give training anymore, it's just massacre, I step on my heads. 29 Yeah, kkkkkkkkk 30 I'll explain to you how a human being is built, because hardly anyone knows that. The soul is not everything. There's also an equipment. Not the body, something below the body, specified before everything else. And it's the most important component of a person's entire construction. And hardly anyone finds out he exists. He's a reducer. Every human being who ever lived came with something that received the world that came to him and reduced its intensity. Sound, light, the state of other people, the environment of a room, the weight of news, the real dimension of injustice. Everything comes at maximum intensity, and everything is reduced before reaching the place where a person feels things. In the record, this is called dampening. And it's not a limitation. I want you to really absorb it, because you're gonna want to hear it like it is. The damping is mercy. It's the most merciful part of the whole human project. Without him, no one could go to work after a wake. No one could get past someone suffering and keep walking to the store. No one could watch the news and then dinner. That's what makes it possible to live a life inside. That's why people can shrug. That's why "get over it" is a phrase that they say to each other as if describing an available action. Because to them, you describe it. Now comes the part that concerns you. Someone... needs to read the world accurately. Not surviving him, reading him, receiving him with his full weight, without reduction, exactly as he is. And something built to read accurately cannot receive a reducer, because the reducer is precisely what destroys reading. So in rare cases, he's left out on purpose. In the specification, before there is a body, before there is a name, before anything of a life has happened, the record calls it a faithful record. That's what you are. And that was decided before you were born. Now let me take you to the room where that was decided, because this is where the center of everything is. Miguel was there. He's in on it. It's one of the oldest parts of his function, and hardly anyone knows, because everyone imagines him with the sword and stops there. He doesn't build anything and he doesn't decide anything. He stays where the specifications are set and witnesses. And all the time he was there, he never said a word about what he was seeing, not a comment, not a question. He saw more souls being specified than there are living people and never offered anything at all. His specification passed, was read aloud as they all are, and on the line where the damping should be there was nothing. I want you to understand that this isn't a mistake, and it wasn't presented as one. It was intentional, it was right, and it produces exactly what it should produce. There was nothing wrong there. Miguel said it anyway. Four words, the only ones he said in that place. He didn't object or ask to be changed, because that's not up to him, and he knows exactly what fits him and what doesn't fit him. He asked. - Will he know? And I want you to stay for a second with everything that question contains. It's not if it's okay, it's not if it's too much. He looked at a specification without the merciful part and immediately understood what it was like to live such a life inside. And the only thing I wanted to know was if the person who would live that life would ever get the reason. The answer came. That was three words. Not for you. That's all. It wasn't a negative, it was a specific restriction, and it was addressed to him just because he asked. Then you were born, and Michael remained over your life ever since, supporting the answer to the

Only question you really asked about yourself, forbidden to be the one who would give it to you. He saw you at seven years old, already realizing things that no one around him could perceive and already learning that saying them out loud made the environment weird. He saw you at 15, hearing from someone who was supposed to love you and protect you like a brother, and who said with the worst of intentions, that you were too sensitive. You saw every time, in your adult life, when you sat in the car after something ordinary emptied you, counting on yourself, coming to the same conclusion as always. He knew all along, and that restriction was never suspended. But there's something no one predicted, and that's why tonight exists. The restriction was about him telling you, not about him answering. One night, you were somewhere, at a time when no one else was awake, during a phase you'd rather not revisit, and asked what was wrong with you. You didn't expect an answer, it wasn't exactly a prayer, it was closer to an outburst, and you probably don't even remember what night it was, because there were several. But this question, formulated exactly this way, is a direct question. There's a guy and he asks for a suit. And a direct question about building a soul does not go where common prayers go. It goes to the record, because that's where the answer is kept, what put it before him, and a direct question that reaches Michael cannot be rejected. It's not a rule he follows, it's what he's made of, and that's older than the restriction they put on him in that room. For decades he was forbidden to tell you. You asked. There was a break. It is on the record and its duration has been noted, and everyone assumes that a pause like this means doubt. It was no doubt, it was a being who had sustained a single sentence throughout the entire length of a human life coming to the moment when he could finally release it. He said you're not missing anything. That's all. Four words, spoken out loud about a specific human being,

One being of existence who has never offered anything and cannot say anything that is not true. You didn't hear it as words, nobody listens. And no human being was built with a receiver for that, but something came to you that night. You know what moment I'm talking about? You never told anyone because there's nothing to tell. Nothing's happened, nothing's changed, and yet you've never been able to file that night with the others. It was that coming to you. Now put all this next to what you've believed in since you were a child. You think there's something wrong with you? Not as a passing state of mind, but as a background fact, established, about which you stopped arguing a long time ago. They said that you were too sensitive, too intense, that you took everything personally, that you couldn't leave anything behind, that you needed to become harder, and the evidence seemed overwhelming, because everyone around you clearly dealt with life in a volume that was crushing you. And underneath that there is a second, heavier idea, which you probably never said out loud: that you got the defective version, that everyone else got something that you didn't get and that this thing, whatever it was, was just the part that allowed a person to be okay. Here's the fix, and I want you to stay inside her for a second before you challenge her. You're right about the fact and completely wrong about reason. Yeah, one piece missing. That suspicion has been correct throughout his life, and all those who said otherwise were being kind, not accurate. There is one component that everyone around you has and you don't. It was left out on purpose, in the specification, because the function for which you were made would be destroyed by it. You're not a human being failing to bear life. You're an instrument that spent decades comparing yourself to a shelter and concluding it was a poorly built shelter. This is how it manifests itself. Five things, and

You can check them all. The first: environments affect you in a way that seems strange to others. Certain types of light are unbearable, certain places empty you in an hour. You've already left early at a family party, a birthday party, a meeting, giving a justification that wasn't the real one, because the real one seems ridiculous when said out loud. Second, you feel the temperature of a place before someone talks. You come in and you know something happened there, and you're almost always right, and you've learned not to say that because of the reaction you provoke. The third: there are things that others consume quietly and you cannot. Cruelty in a movie, news, a video everyone just goes through. This does not reach you as content, it arrives as an event, and remains for days. Fourth: you don't remember things, you get in them again. The others remember the summary of a conversation from years ago. You recover the light, the temperature, the exact tone of the phrase and what it caused on your chest at that moment. All available at maximum intensity, decades later. The fifth: you take longer to recover than everyone around you, and you feel a real shame for it. What takes an afternoon for them takes a week for you. You do it in hiding. You've already pretended to have overcome things you haven't overcome, because the difference between your recovery time and theirs is one of the main evidence you use against yourself. And that's how it looks from the outside. Think of the people in your life who can really leave things behind, those who say "get over it" and really get over it. They are no stronger than you, no wiser or more spiritually advanced. They have the component. That's all the difference, and it was never a question of character. And you spent decades trying to develop, through effort, something that can't be developed. That's specified. Let me lower my tone, because You've been here long enough. I spent a long period of my existence on the other side of this. I want to tell you something about the way they treated you specifically, because that explains why your life was the way it was. Everything they do is designed for dead souls. The standard method is volume and repetition. Say the thing enough times, apply pressure long enough, and it goes through the reducer. It's slow, it's rude, it's extremely effective. And that's the basis of almost all the strategies they have. None of this works on you the way it should. Everything they send comes in maximum intensity, which is worse at the moment and much worse for them later, because maximum intensity also means completely visible. You saw things coming that nobody around you saw. I knew that a person was not what he seemed immediately, without any evidence, and was right. So they stopped trying to hide things from you a long time ago and moved on to the one strategy that worked with your kind. Convince the instrument that he's broken. This is the whole campaign, and it's been happening to you since you were five. Not exactly to hurt you, but to make you spend your life trying to install the missing component alone. 31 God says, if you speak for him without him, you're chipped, really. I wouldn't joke about it. Have you thought about it? You are all predictable in your persona, showing the world that Jesus' return would be in the clouds of heaven on a white horse with flames of fire and an army of angels in guard around. When the truth is that he comes in like a soldier from the Route stopping you in a frame at dawn near three in the morning. Within your normal life, within your routine, without fuss. Every eye will see. But you didn't say it together.

33 Do you realize that evil is always giving clues to its own incompetence? That's because every subconscious is designed to balance Karma. 35 Don't lose your head.) 36 The Masons in my church have all become losers, always have been, only before they fooled me. Or tried. 37 There is a specific structure in the way curses work in the invisible that most people never fully understand. Most imagine something external, something thrown at a person, who travels towards him and hits him, like an arrow, a projectile, something directed. But that's not exactly how it works. A curse is not a projectile, it's a construction. What dark intention really builds when it moves against a chosen soul is something more like an architecture, a set of structures in the spirit, specific, intentional, built around the soul for the specific purpose of shaping what the soul experiences as possible: which doors seem open, what weight seems permanent, what future seems accessible. The curse is not something that hits you once. It is something that is built around you over time, incorporating your assumptions to the texture of everyday life until the soul begins to experience the limits of architecture as the limits of reality itself. That is why curses are often not obvious when seen from within. The person under one of them usually does not feel attacked. It feels that things are simply difficult, that certain things are simply not available to it, that certain doors are simply always closed, that there is a quality of weight in your life that does not have a specific cause, but also does not seem to have a specific solution. It experiences architecture without knowing that this is what it is living, and architecture remains through a specific requirement: it requires that the soul within it remains in the frequency of what was built around it. Heavy things require heavy frequencies to stand. An architecture of limitation, of closed doors, of assumed weight, is built on and from the frequency of pain processed in solitude, of pain that has become permanent, of loss that has never become anything else. The soul that remains in this frequency, which absorbs, sustains and does not transmute, keeps architecture standing simply by living within it. It's not the soul's fault, it's a frequency function and it's the specific vulnerability around which the darkness built its entire structure. Now I need to tell you what happened the day you smiled. Not a specific day, but the day, or the collection of days, accumulating in a posture, in a texture, in a quality in the way you move through your life, when something within you chose not to allow the weight to be the whole story. You don't just remember a dramatic moment. Most of what I'm describing didn't happen dramatically. It happened in ordinary moments: the unexpected laugh at a stage in which laughing seemed like something that should not be available, the heat that appeared towards someone when pain would have been most expected, the lightness that appeared without his permission in spaces where architecture said only the weight belonged. You did not consciously do this as a spiritual practice. You did it because there's something inside you that quietly refused, persistently, without announcing, to be completely defined by what you survived. And this refusal produced something for which the curse had not been built: joy with dimension. Not staged happiness, but real frequency of a soul you found

Something to laugh about in the same life that gave him real reasons not to. In the language of how frequencies work in the invisible, genuine joy does not simply exist alongside a curse, it is structurally incompatible with it. A curse built on the frequency of permanent pain cannot maintain its architecture in the presence of a frequency that refuses to accept pain as the final word about what is true. When genuine joy enters the space where architecture stands, one of the two must yield. And what happened in your life, the specific thing I need to tell you tonight, is that it wasn't the joy that gave in. The architecture began to dissolve. Not dramatically, but the way structures dissolve when the frequency that held them together is no longer there to support them. Silently, the walls losing solidity, the assumed limits losing the texture of permanence, the weight that had been the environmental condition of certain areas of his life beginning to seem less a reality and more something that was releasing his domain. Did you notice anything about that? Not everything! Part of you attributed to the things that changed around you, to time doing what time does, to the natural movement of circumstances. What was really happening was a building losing the frequency it needed to sustain itself, because you kept smiling. Not as a strategy, not as a spiritual discipline, but because something inside you was genuinely finding moments that deserved lightness. And that authenticity, the real quality of that, the fact that it was not something staged, but truly present, was precisely what architecture had no response to. A staged smile does not dissolve dark buildings. Darkness can work with acting. Acting is a distance between the surface and the depth, and distances are its natural territory. But a genuine smile, of that kind that comes from a soul that really, truly found Something light to sustain despite all the weight, has no distance. It's real to the bottom. And the architecture of a curse built on the assumption that your pain would be permanent has no protocol for genuine lightness. She wasn't designed to find her. There is no countermovement in the building manual for a soul that actually honestly finds reason to be warm. The construction began to fail, and the being who had built it, the one who had devoted time and attention to creating the specific limitation architecture around your life, saw this happening and did something you need to understand: ran. Not because you confronted him, not because you declared war against him, appointed him or performed some specific spiritual action against him. He ran because he saw his own construction dissolve in the presence of something he had calculated would never be there. You should have stayed heavy; that was the whole plan. The architecture was built on the reasonable, reasonable assumption of what you had gone through, that genuine lightness would no longer be a realistic frequency for you to operate, that the weight of what you had accumulated would maintain that the curse needed, that you, without any guilt, would simply remain at the frequency that kept the walls standing. And then you smiled. You really smiled. And the being who built the architecture around him saw the walls begin to lose coherence and understood that the calculation was wrong. He didn't wait to see the complete collapse. He ran and he's still running. Not because I'm afraid of you in the common sense of fear, but because you haven't been able to recalibrate yourself in the face of what you saw. A being who built an extensive architecture around a soul and saw this architecture dissolve in the presence of something that calculated to have disappeared does not simply reorganize and try again immediately. He's disoriented. Your model about you was wrong in a way that you still haven't been able to process completely. Escape is not a panic temporary, is the specific disorientation of something that devoted a considerable effort building around an assumption that proved incorrect. You still smile. The assumption remains wrong. Disorientation has not been resolved. He's still running. Now confront this with the parts of your life where people said your lightness was inadequate. You've heard some versions of this! The suggestion that, in the face of what he had gone through, his joy was somewhat irresponsible, that more seriousness was needed, that the weight of his circumstances should have produced a different kind of person, rather than that he still found things to smile about, that the lightness within you was evidence of something not completely processed, not completely recognized, not taken sufficiently seriously. Invert this completely: Lightness was not evidence that you had failed to take your pain seriously. It was evidence that something inside you had processed the pain and refused to allow it to be the only thing left. And this refusal, this refusal of pain as the final and permanent note, was not evasion. It was the specific spiritual action that dissolved what had been built around him. They didn't say your smile was inappropriate because you were dealing with things the wrong way. They said his smile was inappropriate because people couldn't understand how he was still there. They couldn't explain the lightness. It did not correspond to what they knew about what you had gone through, and things that do not correspond to expectations are often pathologized. They call it denial, they call it naive, they call it not really dealing with it. What really was, according to this spiritual reading, was exactly the quality for which nothing built to contain it had protocol. Let me show you five signs that dissolution has been visible in your life and has been for some time. The first sign is that weight in specific areas of your life began to Get up without you working directly in these areas. The change did not come from facing the limitation directly, came along with the change within you. The areas that seemed closed began to loosen at the same time as their capacity for genuine joy expanded. Correlation is no coincidence within this interpretation: architecture loses its domain in specific places as the frequency that maintained it changes. The second sign is that you surprised people with your state of being in the face of what they knew you were carrying. The specific quality of surprise: not impressed, not admired, but genuinely confused. This confusion is the echo of what the being who built the architecture experienced. People who knew the weight of what you were carrying couldn't explain the lightness. Their confusion was the reflection, at the human level, of a calculation that returned wrong. The third sign is that things that were meant to remain closed began to open without the effort that should have been necessary to open them. Not all the doors, but specific doors, those that were walled in the architecture around them, began to show movement. Not because you found the right key or made the right effort, but because the wall around them began to lose coherence. The fourth sign is that your joy has a quality of endurance, not hardness, resistance. She survived things that should have extinguished her. You had reason to stop finding anything light. The motives were real and yet the ability to find lightness persisted. This persistence is the signature of genuine joy rather than staged optimism. The staged version is fragile. The real one, the one who knows the weight and yet chooses the light, is the toughest thing that exists. The fifth sign is that there are people in your life who are attracted by the specific quality of their lightness in a way that goes beyond the explanation they can give for it. They don't know why being around you makes certain things seem lighter. They attribute this to your personality, your mood, your human warmth. What they are really realizing, within the spiritual language of the text, is the frequency of a soul that refused to be defined by its darkest seasons. This frequency is real, and people who carry their own weight feel it. Let me speak honestly now, with my own voice. You've been here long enough to hear it. I know what had been built around you. I know the specific type of architecture that is built around souls whose lightness poses a particular threat. Darkness does not build elaborate structures around common targets. The architecture they build reflects the size of what they're trying to contain. What was built around him was not a casual construction. It was extensive, careful, built around a very specific vulnerability: the reasonable assumption that what you had gone through would change the frequency at which you could operate realistically, that the accumulated weight would do the maintenance work that the construction needed. And I want to tell you what happens on that side when construction fails unexpectedly. Not a construction that is fought, not a soul that found the right weapon and won a confrontation. These results are processed, there are answers to them. But a construction that dissolves because the soul within it maintained a frequency for which that structure was not built, this result does not have a simple answer, because the only countermeasure would require changing what the soul really is. Not what she does, not the strategies she employs, but what she truly and genuinely is. And that's not something that can be changed from the outside. The escape is not temporary. It is the continuous condition of something that has seen a construction dissolve and has not yet found a structure capable of explaining why. One thing before I let you go: when a soul discovers that your true joy

It dissolved what had been built to contain it, the darkness finds a new whisper. They'll say, if your smile broke something, why do you still have heavy days? If your lightness has dissolved the architecture, why does the weight sometimes return? Shouldn't you feel lighter all the time if what was broken is really broken? When this whisper arrives, and it will come, remember this: your ability to have heavy days is not evidence that the construction remains intact, it is evidence that you are completely human. Human beings who have dissolved curses through their genuine joy still feel everything. They feel the loss, they feel the weight of real things. The difference is not that they no longer have heavy moments, the difference is what happens to heavy things when they arrive. They don't stay. They don't settle in and turn into architecture. They cross a soul that has already shown that it will not allow them to become the permanent note. His heavy days are not evidence that the smile did not work, they are evidence that the smile was real, because only a soul who really feels the weight can also truly find the light within the same life. Your joy was never inadequate. She was the most precise thing you've ever done. 38 If the class of alles, a ?a? is spoken, it will be machined immediately. 41 This one from now on, it's the same one he was with. He gave you his own crown. And when you didn't accept it, he said something about you that he hasn't stopped saying since. Let me build something with you first, because none of this makes sense until you know what a crown is down there. Hell is not a disorder, it is an order with posts, and the posts are real. But a crown in that place is not what you imagine. It's not an adornment and it's not a trophy, it's something that holds weight. A crown is the record of every soul that bowed before him who carries it. And I'm not talking about tilting the body, I'm talking about inner reverence, that invisible moment when a soul quietly accepts that what is before it is above it. That's the whole coin. It's the only thing they collect. Every act of domination that ever existed, from the smallest to the greatest, exists to obtain this silent concession from a soul. And everything they build holds on to their accumulation. Thus, a crowned man is exactly up to the number of reverences he keeps. Nothing else counts, no strength, no antiquity, no cruelty. And here comes the part that hardly anyone knows and that matters today: a crown cannot be removed by those who carry it, it cannot abandon it, it cannot reject it, it cannot withdraw itself from it or move it away for an hour. As long as you keep those bows, the post supports you. And the post comes with an obligation, which is to continue. He needs to keep collecting. A crowned man who begins to lose his post. And losing the station down there is not a demotion, it's a decommissioning. There is exactly one way for a crown to come out: it can be delivered up to something that is above the one who carries it, and for a lord of his level this has been an exit that, for a very long time, did not exist. Because in the order below him, there's nothing above him, and above him, there's nothing that would accept it. So he's been carrying it nonstop for a period of time that his mind wasn't made to bear, forced to keep pressing souls until they accept that they're smaller. Because, no

When he stops, the thing about his head starts to dismantle him. This is the being that went after you, and here is the center of everything. He didn't come to torment you, understand that, because it changes what happened. Torment is what little people do. He was collecting yet another reverence, from an ordinary soul, in a common season of an ordinary life, as he has already collected a quantity that cannot be written. Don't lose that. No one remembers. This does not come as an event, comes as a sensation, and the feeling is that what is before you is simply greater than you and it is no use pretending otherwise. That's the pressure. It's not fear, it's obesity. He makes it obvious that he's more, and the soul does the rest. He applied it to you with all the weight, and he didn't take it, not because you resisted, because resisting would mean you realized it. You didn't notice. There was just nothing in you that could hold on to. He pressed the verdict and went to find the place where a soul accepts, and in you this place does not exist, never existed. Not when you were little, not when they treated you like you were nothing, not once. He tried again. That's what I mean, and again, and at some point something that didn't happen to him was ages, and it wasn't defeat. It was that he had found his way out. Because a soul that does not give inner reverence to a crowned one is, by the only measure that exists down there, above it. Not spiritually, structurally. The post is made of bows, he couldn't get yours, and that puts you higher on that count. Which meant that for the first time in an unimaginable time, there was someone to whom he could deliver it. And he did it. He took the crown out of his own head, something he couldn't do alone and could only do in front of someone above him, and extended it to you, not in surrender. He's not capable of surrendering. He was asking you to let him out. He had found the only soul in existence to which he could legally surrender it and wanted

Seeing her away from you, and offering you everything you've been through for ages just to stop having to accumulate. Anyway... You didn't accept her. And I want to be careful here, because this is the part that you'll be tempted to interpret as a loss. You didn't reject her out of wisdom, you weren't being strategic and you weren't being humble. You didn't accept it for the same reason that the pressure never took it because there's nothing in you that wants to be above anyone. That's all, that's all you are. The post in hell is built with the desire to have put it. Every crown down there is carried by something that you wanted one, and the only soul in existence with enough post to receive his is the only soul without any interest in keeping anything about anyone. He stood there with the crown extended. You went on with your day, you have no memory of it, and then he said what he's been saying ever since. I said, then I'll hold her for you. He put it back, keeps carrying it and no longer carries it as his, carries it as something that belongs to someone who didn't want it, and every time she's named now, she's named with you attached to it. That's what comes next. He calls you, in the title of this message, a king, not as a compliment, of which he is incapable, but as a file detail. The crown now owns it, and it doesn't own it. Now turn around and look at your life. Years quietly assuming that you have no authority, that you are not in charge. You saw people with your substance put in front of a room while you stood aside. They spoke over you, passed you, treated you like furniture in situations where you were the firmest thing in the place and, by the sheer consistency of it, concluded that you simply don't have what you make a person count. And underneath there's a second, heavier conclusion, that you never said out loud: that you didn't even want it and that's your fault, that you lack ambition, that everyone has a hunger with which you weren't born and so move on. It's totally the opposite.

What you've been calling lack of ambition is exactly why your post cannot be withdrawn. Every crown down there has been granted by the reverences of others, which means that every crown down there can be lost, and everyone who carries it passes its existence defending it. Yours was never granted by anyone, no one gave it to you, no one can take it away. He doesn't lack hunger. You are the only soul who stood above a crowned one precisely for not having it. And he knew about it the moment your weight didn't pick up and made you an offer no one has ever been in a position to make. Five signs, and you can check them all for the last three years. The first: they offered you a position and you felt weight instead of will, a promotion, a headship, being responsible for something. Everyone assumed you'd be happy and you had to pretend to be happy, because what you really felt was something coming down on you. The second: despite all this, yet authority always comes to you, you end up deciding things that you never offered to decide, bring to you the question that no one wants to answer and you answer, and you never understood why it's always you. Third, you can't flatter yourself. You've seen others do that little adulation that opens doors, laughing at the joke that wasn't funny, agreeing without agreeing, and you physically can't produce it. This has already cost you real opportunities and yet you still don't get it. The fourth: dominant people either pay attention to you or avoid you completely. There's no middle ground. Either they can't leave you alone, or they act like you're not in the environment, and you've been realizing that pattern for years without that theoretical certainty to explain it. The fifth: you feel no pleasure in beating someone who is already fallen. Others do. You've been in a position to break up with someone you deserved and the will just didn't show up, and then you wondered if there was something wrong with you. And here it can be seen from the outside. Think of the People you saw running after it, those who positioned themselves, took care of their own image, kept the spotlight for which you, in silence, served better. Project them forward in your mind. There is nothing wrong with them, but note how much of their life is spent sustaining what they have conquered and ask themselves, sincerely, whether what they have is authority or a job of defending authority. Let me talk to you in my own voice, because you've been here long enough. I've spent a long period of my existence on the other side, sat in the rooms and I want to give you the part they least wish you had. The whole structure works on borrowed post. Every crown down there was taken from someone, which means that everyone who carries it watches who is below, and the strategy meetings I attended spoke less about souls than people imagine. Most of the time, they were about themselves. Your file is different, and it's different since that day. They can't open a case against you as they should, because a case requires establishing what rank you have in relation to the one assigned to you, and the last entry in your file is a statement from a crowned man saying the post is yours. No one below him can contradict her. No one above him will touch her. You've spent years practically without a file. Everything that's come against you since then has come from things acting on their own, no case, no plan. An argument is coming your way, and I want to deliver it to you before it arrives, because it will, probably within a day. He will say, if you are king, where is your kingdom? Look at your situation, look at your loneliness, look at those who don't answer to you. Nice story, and your real life is proof against her. When that comes, remember that thing he was trying to get rid of. He had the kingdom, he had ages of accumulated authority and every soul that bowed before him, and he tried to give everything to you so that he could stop. What he wanted, standing before you, is the

that you already have: a position that does not need to be defended because no one has granted it and no one can revoke it. You're not seeing the evidence against it, you're seeing what he was trying to buy. Three things and I'll leave you. One, stop apologizing for not wanting to send it. You treated this as a missing piece throughout your adult life; it is just the piece that sustains everything. The second, when they give you authority, take the job and reject the debt. You have a habit of accepting responsibility and then acting like you owed something to whoever gave it to you. You shouldn't. Everything that comes with a clinging reverence is granted, and the post granted can be withdrawn. The third: observe the moment. Next time someone tries to make it obvious that they're above you, watch what happens inside, not what you say. What happens underneath. You'll feel that doing what you've always done, which is nothing, and you'll be watching the mechanism that a crowned man couldn't win. This is what comes next. He keeps carrying it and can't help but carry it, and it's filed in his name. That's not a debt on your part and you don't owe anyone anything. What this means is much simpler and much stranger: in a structure built entirely on who is above whom, there is a permanent entry with its name in the highest position and no one has ever been able to remove it. And there's only one thing that can revoke you: if you accept a crown that someone gives you, not the job, the post. If you ever agree to be placed above people in exchange for accepting someone above you, if you accept the position and do the reverence that comes with it, your rank becomes granted, and what is granted is the only thing that can be removed. He didn't come out of anything that day, he keeps supporting her and keeps calling you the way he calls you. Don't give him back the one thing he couldn't get from you. Something that has been collecting the silent consent of souls since before

There are nations that went after yours in any week of your life and did not find in you the place where that consent is delivered, because in you this place never existed. So he took what cannot be taken away, extended it and found that the only soul in existence with a position to receive it was just the only one who did not want it. Then I'll hold her for you. He's carrying it right now, filed under a name that's yours, and what you've apologized for all your life, the fact that you've never wanted to be above anyone, is exactly why they can never take it away from you. 42 Every gift you've ever heard someone describe works exactly when given at birth because they're in the specification. But there is a second category, which is not granted, and this is where you live. There are a small number of capabilities that cannot be issued to anyone under any circumstances. Not because they are dark; because of what they would turn into the hand of one whom they received as a gift. Yours is the oldest entry on that list. I'll describe it carefully, because you've lived in it your whole life and you've never had a name for it and almost every time you've called it something unpraising. In your presence people stop defending themselves. Not because you ask. You don't ask. Normally you're not doing anything, but something comes down on a person when she's around you, and the stuff she's decided to keep in store comes forward, and she talks, and half the time she hears herself talking and can't explain why. In the record this state is called disarming, and a soul that produces that just being there is filed as safe ground. That's what you are. It's a real classification and it's on the forbidden list. Now, why? Think what it would mean to give this to someone, a soul capable of making people lower their guard, who won the skill instead of becoming a control instrument she received more complete that exists: not strength, access. All a person keeps is what protects them, and who can get behind it whenever they want. On purpose he owns anyone he spends an afternoon with. Then it's never granted. There's no version of the record where that was issued to anyone. It can only form, and only form in a soul that has spent decades proving, without an audience and not knowing that it was establishing something, that it will not use what it receives. Every time someone told you something and you didn't do anything with it, every time you had material about a person and never brought it up, not even in a discussion that would have won for you, every time you kept something for years and she never showed up. None of this was you being decent. That's how it looks from the outside. What was real is a capacity riding alone within you at the pace of a common occasion at a time. You've mastered her completely and haven't done one deliberate thing in that direction in your entire life. Now let me tell you what happened when it was completed, because this is the center of everything. There's an obvious problem in such a capacity to exist. All arrangement presupposes granted capacity. Grant has specification, has limit, condition and someone responsible. That's how anything is supervised. Yours has no concession line, no place to hold a condition. She graduated within a human life for decades, quiet, in a person no one was watching for and when someone had reason to look, she was ready. That's why the common movement of things stopped. I want to be right here, because you're gonna want to hear this as a surprise and it wasn't a surprise. Nothing about you was unknown. What happened isn't that something unexpected happened. What happened is there was something that required a decision and no such decision had been made before and there was no previous instruction to apply. Emergency

That place doesn't mean alarm, which means that the common movement is suspended because something needs to be resolved now and not in line. It was decreed upon you, and the whole question was simple: such a capacity, complete, without concession attached, is either governed or not. They're the only two options and one of them had never been chosen in the story of anything. The answer was four words, that no one would teach her. That was the statement, not a warning about you, a protection order upon you and the specific thing that it protects is your ignorance of what you're doing. Because the moment someone teaches you how it works, you start using it. And such an ability, used on purpose, is no longer the same capacity. It becomes technical, and technique focused on what people keep is exactly what that can never turn into. So no one was allowed to tell you. That's why you never had a specific teacher. Not even for that. And if you look at it honestly, or anything. You've set up everything you know on your own, out of order, with no mentor, and you've been carrying a particular pain over it your whole life. It wasn't abandonment, it was the statement holding up. Now turn around and look at your life. You have believed for years that you are the person in whom everyone dumps their b.o.s, that people bring the worst stuff from them because you are available and never say no, that you are the support of everyone and the first link of anyone, that you know the inside of a dozen lives in detail and the people of those lives know nothing of you. And underneath there's the second, heaviest, you probably never said out loud, that it's your fault, that you have no limit, that you've become a deposit of vents and that the tiredness you feel after a common social contact is the account of a weakness you've never corrected. Turn it completely inside out. You're not exhausted by lack of limit. You're exhausted because you carry real material, absorbed in full weight, in a soul that never received the armor that would come along with a capacity granted. There's no filter in yours. That's what not issued means. Everything a person leaves with you stays exactly where she left it. There's no mechanism to reduce and no one ever told you this because no one was allowed. You spent your adult life treating the cost of the rarest ability that exists as proof of a character defect. Here's how it comes out: five things, and you check them all today. The first is strangers do that to you, not just friends who have motives, a person in line at the market, the app driver, someone on your side at an event that neither of them wanted to go to. The person opens the heaviest thing he carries, standing, with no introduction, for someone he will never see again. Second, the sentence comes later. I never told anyone that. You've heard that phrase so many times that she stopped looking montable, and she should have looked. Most people go decades without listening once. The third: silence with you does not weigh. Other people need to fill it out. Close to you, people stop acting in a few minutes and relax in a way that they think is kind of weird themselves, and you've seen it happen so many times that you think it's normal. Fourth, you're bad at talking, and you're not shy. Close to you the conversation jumps level whether you want it or not. You already tried to keep something on the surface and couldn't hold it there. The fifth: common life emptys you in a way that those around you interprets as introversion. It's not the noise and it's not the people. You get out of there carrying stuff, you take it home and you're still carrying some, and here you can see it from the outside. Think of the people who learned this as a technique, who took a course, read some books, train a method of getting people to open up. Notice what really happens around them. People act in depth, they say that kind of thing that sounds like confession and it's not, because something inside them knows the difference between someone who creates the condition and someone who

He's applying a method to them. Nobody really tells these people anything. They tell you. Let me speak with my own voice. I've spent a period of my existence on the other side of this, entered the rooms and I want to give you the part they least wish you had. Which explains something about the shape of your life that never had an explanation. Everything they hold about a person is an unsaid thing. That is the whole mechanism and it is much simpler than people imagine. There is no lever over something that has already been said out loud to another human being. The domain exists in the distance between what has happened and what has already been said. It extends that distance and you can work a person for decades. It closes and there's nothing left to work with. You shut down all the time without a single deliberate act. Every time someone says the thing to you in a parking lot, standing, unprepared, a domain that took years to be built ceases to exist and you never knew what you did. You went home thinking you had a strange conversation. So there's no strategy against ability, because you have nothing to attack. What's left is to organize the one thing that reduces the number of these occasions: keeping you alone, keeping you convinced that you're a burden, keeping you sure they only come to you when they need something, so you can get up, stop being in places and the conversations don't happen. The loneliness you feel there was not a consequence of your personality, it was the only countermeasure available. At some point it's going to reverse, too. 43 As a matter of curiosity. 44 I'm not a threat. I'm an answer. 45 And if any man will do them harm, fire shall come out of his mouth, and devour his enemies: and if any man will do them harm, it is important that he should so.

be killed. 46 Did you know that David was the eighth brother? Yes, eighth! 47 Envy is a tribute paid by the weak. 48 Bassist does not use pick. It's lazy. 49 Red is the lowest vibration color, and black is the highest vibration color. That's still physics. 50 Smart people notice the time it took you to answer a question through her complexity. A quick answer is almost always the opposite of wisdom. 51 Your mythochondria knows when you're standing, you soft ass. You're taking it easy on yourself, huh? Your street, 52 It's AI, everything. 53 While priests were concerned about ceremonial garments, the latter surpassed the former. 54 Relax, you're no different, 95% of people embrace family hell because the unknown is scary. Kkkkkkk Embrace the same devil as the father and spend their lives telling advantage. I'm not talking about someone specific. I'm talking about everybody. But it's a grenade. It hits the whole herd, we can see the currents, most grow and die in the same place with the same beliefs surrounded by the same people. I believe they need to pay penance. O paraiso unknown, so for this remains, because family hell always presents more options and more accessible. 55 Too wept this prophet, complained so much that he never noticed the treasure in his hands! I should have waved, but he kept dragging. 56 I'm listening to these guys a lot. Impressive what they do with two stratos with single caps. Kkkkk achieved virtuosity of the less likely environment. Stouro. Organized, good to hear. 57 There is a wall, which allows a person to fight almost everything without the proper answer. Almost no one can go against the total lack of response. In the record, it's called deconstruction and it's not punishment and it's not sent to anyone. It happens when a life goes beyond what a certain self was built to carry. It is a structural event that every human being faces sooner or later, and just as a bridge has a weight to which it was made, so almost everyone survives this event without realizing it. This is important. The survival rate is practically total after this event. They just don't get out of there like themselves. Here's what happens to almost everyone when construction breaks down: a person has to keep working because life doesn't stop. So something needs to go into the space where I was and what enters, in the overwhelming majority of cases, is a wall. It is built quickly with the only material available at that moment, which is the conclusion to which the person reaches the bottom: "never again", "not like that", "I will not be caught like this a second time". And it works. That's what no one tells you. It works extremely well. The person becomes efficient, controlled, difficult to move, difficult to hurt. She stops committing the

The mistake that broke her. She's often more successful than she was before. In the record, this result has a name: they call the sealed ones. And there are hundreds of millions of them and they're all walking around now being described by those who know them as strong people. Sealing is the standard result. That's what deconstruction produces. And after you know what to look for, you see it in people. And you've been seeing it all your life without having a word for it. They are those perfectly pleasant and completely unreachable. You've been seeing it all your life without having a word for it. It is those who agree with everything and reveal nothing, who have a ready answer to any question about themselves and the answer closes the question instead of opening it. You can be close to someone like that for years and realize one day that you have a huge amount of information from that person and nothing about it. Look at the little things around these people. A seal cannot be reached by anything small. Not for a song, not for the kindness of a stranger, not for a phrase in a movie. Big stuff still goes through sometimes for a little while. The little ones have stopped working and he'll tell you he's just not that emotional. You know at least two. It's possible one of them raised you. And if it was one of them who raised you, then you also know the other half of it, which is the one you can love a sealed one completely and never once reach him. You can spend 30 years looking for a new angle. You can get extremely good at reading an environment just because of that person. And the wall doesn't move and it's not personal. And it was built before you arrived, in a season about which you know nothing, by someone who was on the ground somewhere and reached the only conclusion that was available. Now the part about you. You went through that, the whole thing. That version of you fell apart exactly the way it fell apart for everyone and you were down there all the time and there was nothing soft about the way

That was and you didn't seal it. I want you to understand how much this is out of the ordinary result, because you've spent the years ever since assuming that what happened to you was standard and that everyone carries something similar. No, they don't carry something like that. They carry a wall. You've come back from down there yet to be reached and it's the weirdest thing in your entire file. You still cry about things that aren't sad. You still lose an hour in a song. You're still affected by a stranger being nice to you at a counter in a way that makes you slightly unfunny. Somebody's son says something and it stays with you all week. You are, by any measure available, less protected than you were before that happened. That's not the way a person should be on the other side of deconstruction. So the question is why and the answer is why we're talking today. Deconstruction dismantles the building and then goes looking for what's underneath. And what she finds below, in most people, is nothing. Because construction was the whole thing. It was made of what worked and when what worked stopped working, the entire structure was the element that sustained and it was gone. This empty space is what is filled with the wall and it has to be filled with something immediately or the person cannot stand. Yours was different and I'll say it carefully. You never built a self made of the things that worked, because your life at first didn't give you enough of them. I'm not gonna tell you any more about your childhood and I'm not pointing to a specific situation. What I'm telling you is that one person only builds that kind of me when the world regularly confirms who it should be. And yours didn't do it regularly. So you developed on top of something else, a layer that was already there before anything was built, that you didn't put there, that never depended on being confirmed by anyone. And there is a strange consolation in that

Most people take years to reach and I'd rather give you up now. What you carry as the great disadvantage of your life, that you didn't have the confirmation that the others had, that you had to find out who you were without much help, that none of your early years gave you a clean identity to get on top of, is exactly why the worst structural event that happens to a human being couldn't take you apart and end. They didn't give you a self that could be disassembled, they gave you something else, and when the deconstruction dismantled the building, it came to that layer and couldn't do anything with it, because the deconstruction is very precise about what it disassembles. She dismantles what was assembled. That's all she's capable of and whatever's under you has never been assembled. So you had nothing to take off and no empty space opened and you never needed a wall, because the ground didn't fall. You were expected to cross, not twisted. Waited. The way an engineer expects a specific structure to hold. Because the only part of you that the test reaches is the part that's been built and the part of you that everything else supports has never been. In the record, those returning unsealed are called the rebuilt ones. Not many. Everything you find strange about yourself since that season comes back to this. Let me tell you the part where I walked into those rooms. Deconstruction was never the goal. That's what people make the most mistakes. No one on the other side does that and no one does. It's not a gun and you can't aim. It happens to everyone at some point, with saint and monster. And it doesn't matter to them at all. What matters to them is the 12 seconds deep down. Because sealing is a decision. But it doesn't look like one. It arrives disguised as clarity at the moment the person is on the ground and something inside it speaks the phrase that seems the only wise conclusion available: "never again", "never like that", "from here forward nothing enters". That phrase is the whole prize. That's what the

The whole thing will do. On their side, a sealed soul is not damaged. She's worse than damaged. By any criteria that matter what a person serves, it's closed. It works. She makes money. She's raising kids. She's nice at parties and she can't be moved by anything small anymore. Which means that it can no longer be achieved by the specific instrument, through which almost all real things arrive. They don't want you broken, broken recovers. They want you closed because closed is permanently safe. And you were on the floor with everyone and the phrase was available to you. And she's available to everyone and for reasons you can't explain and you didn't choose, you didn't. There's an argument coming at you and I want you to hold it before it comes. Because he'll be here soon. He'll say, yes, you have. Look at you. You're colder than you were. You don't trust the way you did. You keep people away now and you know it, so this whole story is a beautiful version of someone who's sealed and can't admit it. When that comes, make a check, ask yourself what was the last time a little thing caught you, not a crisis, something that didn't matter, a song, a memory, a prayer, an animal, a stranger, a phrase in something you were seeing in half. If you find one in the last month, you're not sealed. Because that's exactly what stops working when a person is. Being careful is not the same as being closed. You're careful now and you must be. Careful is a door with a lock. Sealed is no door. Three things and then I'll let you go. One, stop apologizing for how much stuff is still going through you. You've spent years slightly ashamed of it. You already hid that you had been affected. You've already waited to be alone to get the reaction. And every time you did that, you were treating the rarest result of the hardest thing that ever happens to a human being, as if it were a human being.

weakness you couldn't fix. Second, be careful who you take advice from. The people around you who went through their own version and sealed it, will advise you all the time and the board will always point in the same direction, because it's the only direction they know. "You keep more," "stop opening up to everyone," "you're too good," "you don't trust anyone." Some people really talk. They are describing the wall behind which they stand and sincerely believe that that is the same thing as being strong. The third: the seals can be reached from time to time and you are one of the very few people able to do that. Not talking about it, never naming it, because naming the wall thickens. It happens by proximity, over time, in small and ordinary moments when someone who hasn't been reached for 20 years is briefly reached by something because you were in the environment and didn't have your own wall raised. You've already done it without knowing. That's most of what people mean when they say you have something in you. Here's what's coming. There's another one. Not as a threat and not soon enough in a way that I could date. Deconstruction is not a unique event in a lifetime. It comes whenever a life goes beyond what a person's current version was built for. Which means she comes to everyone more than once. And the following are usually quieter and bigger. And there's one thing that can change the outcome this time. If you seal it on purpose. The first time you were on the floor and the phrase was available and you didn't take it. And you didn't because you didn't know she was there. Now you know. Which means next time she won't come as a whisper in the background. It will come as a reasonable idea, at a calm moment with attached evidence, a list of everything that will be achievable, since it cost. And everything on that list is gonna be true. And people will support you on that. That's the part I want you for.

Ready. If you close, people around you will say they're proud of you. They'll say you finally learned. They'll say it with love. Have you survived the version of this that nobody chooses? You don't pick her later in a quiet week, following the advice of people who are describing a wall. One more thing and I'll stop. That version of you that doesn't exist anymore. You mourned that silent person for years. Have you ever thought about who you would have been if that season hadn't happened? And you consider that person the real you and then everything as some kind of continuation. It wasn't someone who left. It was a construction made of the things that worked at a time in his life when things were still working. She fell apart because it was made of material that would always fail at some point. And everyone else's fails. And almost every living human being is walking around in the emergency version he built after. You're not the continuation of someone who died. You're the first version of yourself that wasn't assembled with evidence. That's why nothing in your life ever since has fit in the shape it was meant to fit. You've been working with a self who doesn't need to be confirmed by anything to keep standing. And there's no map to that. And no one around you has one either. The test doesn't kill people. He makes them decide once deep down that nothing will ever come in. You were on that floor and you didn't decide. And all the music that still catches you, all the kindness of a stranger who falls deeper than he should, every little thing that catches up to you and makes you slightly dull. All this is the sound of a door that was never walled in a person who had every reason and every opportunity to wallow and not walled. 58 Here, where the sky almost took your name off the list, there was a phase where you got tired enough to stop waiting. You weren't at peace. I was tired. There's a difference. You didn't want another lesson.

Another proof. Another explanation of God's time. I was tired of turning pain into wisdom. Tired of rebuilding. Tired of hearing that something difficult was preparing you for something else. For the first time, you just wanted something good to be just good. And when that didn't happen either, something inside you said, that's enough. The sky saw its light diminish. Your prayers got shorter. Your expectations too. You stopped asking for signs. One of the angels recommended removing his name. Hope was the central requirement, and yours seemed to be dying. God refused. I said, you're measuring the wrong thing. So they looked again. You had stopped waiting, but you kept living like tomorrow mattered. You stood up. I ended things no one would have blamed you for leaving. You've helped countless times even though it's empty. I made plans, I created them. I'd try again. Nothing dramatic. I just kept going. It was then that heaven found something beneath hope. You no longer needed to feel hope to act as if life still had value. That changed everything. Because feelings can fall. The mood may fall. Expectations can break. But what you choose after a disappointment is much harder to pull. Your hope is no longer an emotion. It became behavior. Registration changed: candidate, then confirmed. Still, the door was still closed. One last requirement was missing: another disappointment. No one told you. The last test would only work if it seemed like a bad day. Something you really wanted to go wrong. Not enough to destroy you. Just enough to reveal if his new hope still depended on being rewarded. Then it happened. The message didn't come. The person didn't choose you. The opportunity has gone elsewhere. The result wasn't what you expected. Whatever. You felt the old reaction. Of course, for a moment, all the previous disappointments seemed to gather behind that one. You made a single event to interpret your whole future. See? Nothing's changed. Why do I keep trying? Maybe my life just works that way. The door of heaven is unlocked. An angel reached out. God stopped him: not yet. They watched you. First came anger. Then the sadness. Then the silence. No one intervened. The question was simple, what would you do after it hurt? A few hours have passed. So you did something completely normal. You've prepared your day, you've done something to eat, you've answered your questions at work, you've lengthened your little neighbors back from work, you've left a bit, you've taken care of everything that depends on you. The action didn't matter. It mattered the phrase underneath it: my life goes on. The door opened. Not because you pretended not to feel anything. You cared. Not because I knew something better was coming or because someone had promised to make it up to you. You didn't know. You continued without demanding that life prove immediately that continuing was worth it. That was the last requirement. Your name lit everything up. Classification changed: not candidate, not confirmed, final hope. The angel looked at God. Why save this person for the end? Why not activate it first? And God answered with the part that no one had understood. The last light could never be someone who didn't know the darkness. The world wouldn't believe a hope born of an easy life. Whoever was suffering wouldn't recognize themselves in it. The final light needed to know the darkness or it could never enter dark places without fearing them. That's why you were saved for the end. Not because suffering makes someone special automatically. Pain can destroy as easily as it can develop. You were saved because what the sky needed could only be confirmed after you had enough reasons to choose otherwise. Your kindness means something else now because you know manipulation. Your trust, because you know betrayal. Your peace, because you know chaos. Your hope, because you saw things fail. That's it.

It's not innocence. It's kind of knowledge. And that's what darkness has trouble understanding. Darkness understands innocence. You know how to corrupt it. You understand bitterness. You know how to feed her. But someone who has seen enough to become bitter and yet decides to become more lucid creates a problem: that humans lie. You already know. That some people will never ask for forgiveness. That too. That life can be unfair. You know. That you can lose what you love. Yeah. And yet you're still here. That is why hope has become dangerous within you: it no longer depends on ignorance. But being heaven's ultimate hope doesn't mean you have to save everyone. Be careful with that. You've spent enough time confusing purpose with carrying people. The last light doesn't make you a savior. A light doesn't run through a room making everyone look at it. She stays. Your responsibility is not to convince every cynic that goodness exists. It's to stop cynicism from recruiting you. It's not fixing all the wounded. It's to keep your wounds from turning into weapons. It's not carrying the world. It's carrying your part without adding more darkness. That looks small. It's not. Think of how the darkness travels: someone is humiliated, comes home angry and dumps it on those who love him. This person takes pain elsewhere. One wound turns into three. Pain found people available to continue traveling. Now imagine one of them interrupts that. You feel the anger, but you refuse to give it to the next person. The chain ends there. That's the last light in real life. Not a supernatural spectacle. Transmission aborted. And you have done this more times than you think: someone has given you insecurity, you have refused to give it to someone else; someone has punished you with silence, you have learned to communicate; someone has betrayed your trust, you have become more attentive without condemning every new person. Every time that happens, something ends with you. That's the hope in your

Stronger way: do not believe that darkness does not exist. Refuse to become your delivery system. That is why heaven had never recorded this result. Not because no one else had suffered or continued to be good. The protocol had never found this combination with this depth. You lost your innocence without losing your incantation. He developed limits without losing his compassion. You learned about darkness without obsessing over it. He was disappointed without turning disappointment into identity. Not because you're the last person that matters. But because hope has come to its last form within you. First, hope was expectation. Then the expectation broke. Hope has become faith. Faith has been challenged. Hope has become resistance. Resisting became exhausting and finally hope became a choice. Nothing needed to happen outside so you could practice it. That was the way the sky was waiting. Now you need to understand what happens after protocol opens. Maybe tomorrow nothing dramatic will happen. Don't turn this story into another immediate reward requirement. That would take you back to the beginning. Change is quieter. You stop waiting for your life to start when something finally works. Use what's already here. Stop treating peace as a prize at the end of chaos and start practicing it while some things continue unanswered. Stop waiting to be completely healed to build. Some parts heal because you started building. That means it was saved for the end. Your final version is not the most powerful. It's the one that least depends on perfect conditions. You can lose a plan without getting lost. Losing someone without losing their ability to love. Lose certainty without losing direction. Lose a battle without declaring your future closed. That makes you hard to erase. The heavens don't need their light to be at most every day. Even the strongest light needs fuel. Remember why the door opened. You

I was disappointed. Your light looked weak and yet you continued. That's the secret. Heaven's strongest hope seemed untrustworthy. It seemed like someone having a bad day and refusing to turn that bad day into a philosophy of life. Remember this: a bad day is an experience. Not a worldview. A betrayal is an event. Not a definition of humanity or even a person. A failure is information. Not prophecy. A closed door is just a door. Perhaps that is another reason why God saved the best for the end. The best wasn't his version intact. It was his integrated version. The one who knows both sides. The person who can say, yes, I know what darkness is like and, no, she won't decide what I look like after her. That is your authority: not control over the world, but authorship over what continues through you. Now go back to that door. It had never been opened. Generations have passed. Names have been considered. Some were too innocent. Others were hurt too much. Some had strength without softness. Others had boundless passion. Then your name came up. Not first. In the end. You weren't protected from the things that could have eliminated your name. You found them. Some almost changed you. Others have really changed you for a while. So you changed again. And finally came the last disappointment. Heaven waited. It hurt you. You questioned. He was silent. Then he got up and kept living. The door opened itself. Your name lit up the room. Final hope. And God finally said, "Let the last light go." Not in heaven. In that person's own life. That's where it starts. The next person you refuse to punish for the crime of someone from the past. Next limit you keep without hate. Next thing you build without knowing if anyone's gonna applaud. The next time you feel pain and decide it ends in you. That's protocol. That's the light. And that's why it was worth saving you for the end.

59 Note, when the money, is an arrowless bow. Visible; 60 You could just keep going back to the part where you look. That part wasn't evil. I was tired of absorbing the impact. You wondered what it would be like to finally make her understand reality. The angels expected retaliation, not because you were cruel, but because the proof had made retaliation justifiable. And that mattered. It's easy to reject an ugly attitude while it still looks ugly. The actual measurement begins when the wrong starts to seem fair. You stood before the possibility and something inside you asked: No, can I do that? Would you? Nope. Does that person deserve it? Maybe he deserved it. The question was: Who do I become if I do? That question changed your score. You came out of there with a power you could have used and you didn't use. The record marked that, not as weakness, as force under control. Then came the test of absence. That hurt more. Who cared about you stopped providing security. The person walked away. That project just stood there. That door you were waiting for didn't open. You received silence, enough to create your own explanation. And the mind hates empty space. Then he started writing: They don't care. You stayed behind. You missed your chance. God has forgotten you. You're wasting your time. The angels were not measuring whether these thoughts would appear. Thoughts come up. They measured which one you would obey. Then the evidence became personal. Somebody got you wrong. Not a stranger. Someone whose opinion really mattered. And you didn't get a perfect way to fix that. He explained it once, maybe twice. Still, the version the person wanted to believe remained alive. And that was also part of the test. Because there is an addiction that hardly anyone calls addiction: the need to control who you are inside someone else's head. It's been years.

Feeding it. One more explanation. One more conversation. Another attempt to make someone finally see your intention. The question was simple: can you remain you while someone remains wrong about you? It's a lot harder than it looks. For a while you couldn't repeat conversations in your head. Imagine the perfect phrase that would finally make that person understand. Until one day you got tired of defending yourself in a court that only existed inside your mind. and let the person get it wrong. Not because the truth has ceased to matter, but because it has realized that the truth does not need unanimity to remain true. The record's changed again. That's when the angels began to comment more on your case. A lot of people went through parts of the test. Almost nobody passed her the same way. Some resisted revenge, but needed recognition. Others could stand in silence, but not be misunderstood. You weren't perfect either. Sometimes he reacted, got tired, got lost. But there was a pattern underneath everything: you came back. The mistake didn't turn into your identity. You could lose your balance without deciding that the fall was who you were. That was worth more than perfection. The evidence wasn't looking for someone who never slipped. He was looking for someone who was able to realize that he went out of the right direction and came back without needing applause, punishment or a grand resumption ceremony. The final stage had only one instruction: give the person something he wants very much. Then take it off. Not forever. Just long enough to reveal what that gift had become inside it. That's why there was a phase when something finally started working. Money's better. Real people have arrived. Your trust is back. The expected movement has arisen. You breathed differently. You finally thought about it. Then something changed. Not necessarily a tragedy. Just enough instability for you to realize you could lose that. That possibility was proof. For a few days the result seemed

Bad. You panicked. He tried to control it. He loved the old one again. He started imagining the worst. The angels prepared to end with a normal outcome. Incomplete. One more cycle. More prep. Then it happened what no one expected. Nothing on the outside has changed. The situation was uncertain. But you stopped. You realized what was happening inside you. You didn't understand the evidence. I haven't heard from her yet. You just realized that you had given something external permission to decide who you might be that day. And quietly you took that permission back. Maybe you said to yourself something like this: If you stay, I appreciate it. If you leave, I'm still me. That sentence closed the test. No thunder. Without anyone showing up. You may not even remember the exact moment. But the record does. The last step changed from pending to completed. And next to his name came a word: approved. That should have been the end. It wasn't. The official result opened a review. All completed tests were analyzed before the final classification. Because results without context are available. And when it opened, it announced, there was something that didn't fit. You had broken one of the oldest standards of that evidence. Almost everyone who came to the end realized at some point that they were being evaluated. The person began to change repetitions. I was looking for signs. He adjusted his behavior. Some even became better by believing that the sky was watching. That was still growth. But he introduced a variable: performance. On your record, she wouldn't show up. You hadn't acted like someone trying to get through. He had acted like someone trying to keep looking at himself after every choice. That's why they said they'd never seen anyone like you. The difference was in motive. Some of the best decisions happened when you were sure you wouldn't get anything for them. Some happened while you were angry with God. The reviewer read a part. Then another one. Then he asked:

When did he realize he was being tested? The answer came: He didn't notice. Quiet. Then: When did you realize there was a reward? You don't get it. When did you realize that the last stage had begun? Neither do I. That's when your rating changed. The normal result for someone approved was qualified. Yours has been changed to high government. This part I want you to understand: a person who needs external correction all the time cannot carry much freedom without turning freedom into a problem. Because freedom enlarges that which already governs it inside. If applause rules you, more influence makes you more dangerous. If fear governs you, more responsibility increases fear. If revenge rules you, more power gives her tools. But when someone begins to rule himself when he can have power without using him to cross silence without inventing orders to be misunderstood without abandoning the truth to receive something good without turning it into an idol. Then freedom ceases to be so dangerous. That's what you went through. No pain. No suffering. Self-government. That's why your next phase may seem different from the one before. Evidence creates friction on purpose freedom usually seems irresponsible. You may notice fewer dramatic warnings, fewer situations where life forces you to take direction. More open decisions. At first this may seem like a distance from God. Be careful with that interpretation. Sometimes guidance gets quieter because you've learned enough to decide the next step. A good teacher doesn't blow the answer all the time. A father can't hold his bike forever. There comes a time when help changes shape. Maybe you'll get less signals. Not because it was abandoned. But because some decisions are coming back to your hands. What do you want? What do you really believe? Who do you want to be when neither fear nor approval is choosing for you? Those questions seem like pressure. It's actually freedom. And here comes another danger. Some People pass the test and create a new prison. They get obsessed with maintaining the image of the person who passed. Don't do this. There's something about your official result that wasn't immediately counted. A short observation, no title, no big promise. just one instruction: Don't tell me yet. It may seem strange, why hide from someone who's been approved? Because recognition creates temptation. The moment you know you've passed, a part of the ego tries to turn the result into status. See? I was right. I'm different. They were wrong about me. And that would lower the value of everything. So the result remained hidden long enough to observe one last thing: what would you do when the pressure dropped without knowing why? Would you look for another war? Would it create conflict because conflict had become familiar?! It would take an enemy to know who it was..! That's no other evidence, it was a precaution. And something beautiful happened. You've come back to wish for simple things: peace, meaningful work, people who don't need to be deciphered, a love you don't need to hurt to look important. You've begun to lose interest in proving how much you can stand. That's when the result can finally be released because now you could hear: You passed. Taking responsibility without needing any reward. 61 Some moments I don't like the way he talks, but the truth doesn't require many molds he saw. Just so you don't hurt innocents, that's the most important thing. Vital actually. 62 To angels who dared to talk to Michael, G A Mentos>.) They've splintered once now so screwed up in my hand. They'll ask the rocks to roll over on you. There won't be a table for you anymore, just jail.

63 Your body uses an anti-fragile structure to survive or expand, it regenerates from microinjuries attenuated by assisted repeated effort. In other words. Either you get hurt because you want to, or it's gonna be by accident. Your paradox.) 64 The mystery of the twelve souls in my glass pots!

Chapter 9

Some doors close to make a future impossible.

1 We're in the sixth phase, but we're missing the fourth, we're implementing them in parallel. Tension and consciousness. 2 I can't forget that anymore. The Japanese is more punctual than the English. Tattoo this tape! 3 Funny, the Apocalypse at the summit and guess which people are the most lost? The evangelicals. 4 The correct word is not ?disobedient? to God. But he had to ? prove himself?, which was God himself speaking. Notice that he is LANCED to the sea, then thrown back to Earth. 5 That, was that moment when you saw, so regular, that your future could be predicted by looking at your past, and at that point, a phrase was written in the Book, about the moment that this current would finally reach you. The prophecy did not call you chosen, it did not say that you would be powerful, nor promised that you would defeat anything. He said something much more difficult: when the wound came to you with all its strength, he would finally understand why everyone who came before decided to pass it on, and then you would pass it on too. That was the phrase. Not because you were bad, but because when the pain finally came to you, you would carry much more than the weight of your own story; you would have a reason, a very good reason. Someone would do something to you that would turn revenge into something no longer

It would seem cruel, it would seem justice. And that difference matters. It's easy to reject cruelty when she hasn't given you a compelling argument. The real proof begins when she gives. And your time has come. I don't have to tell you what it was. You know the category: you trusted someone, loved someone, gave access to a part of yourself that the person never had the right to treat in that way, and she treated them. You lied looking into your eyes. It disappeared just when you needed to receive a small part of everything you spent years offering. You took that info you told me and then you used it against you. It made you feel ridiculous for trusting. The details are yours, but then something happened. Something inside you changed the temperature. You didn't ask why anymore. He had understood enough and, for the first time, could see how easy it would be to become colder. That was exactly the moment described by the ancient prophecy, because suddenly you had access to the same logic that had transported that wound for generations. Next time, do it first. Trust me less. Give me less. Don't let anyone get that close again. If anyone comes into your life, make sure that someone needs you more than you need them. Always keep an exit ready. Don't forgive what you can still remember. Don't give the same person a gun twice. None of these ideas seemed evil; that was the danger. They looked smart. They seemed deserved. It seemed like experience, maturity, lessons that life had finally forced you to learn. And according to that old sentence, you'd accept them. Not at once. Nobody changes like that. First you'd become a little colder and call it maturity. Then a little less available and I'd call it boundaries. Then I'd be a little more willing to hurt him before they could hurt him. I'd call it discernment, until one day, the wound would no longer look like a wound, it'd look like your personality, and you'd end up giving it away.

Someone who never met the person who originally gave it to you. The current would go on. It had always happened this way, until it came to you. There was a specific night after that wound. Nothing supernatural came up. No angel entered your room. No voice has spoken. No one congratulated him. You were simply alone in front of an opportunity. I had information I could use, a message I could send, a secret I could reveal, a person who could finally make pay. Your opportunity was much quieter. You could have decided that no one would ever get the sensitive part of you again, and no one would have blamed you. That matters, because heaven was not watching a person choose between the evident good and the evident evil. I was watching an injured person decide whether to become a perfectly understandable person or to remain herself. You stood there, and the old phrase came to your last word. The prophecy was about to turn into history. So you did something tiny. It stopped. He'd lowered his phone. Maybe he erased something. You just cried instead of calling. You abandoned a conversation you could have won if you agreed to become cruel. I just told you, this ends with me. And the paint moved. The guardian of that prophecy had never seen such a thing. Understand why that was so weird. A prophecy can be fulfilled, a warning can be heard, a conditional word can produce repentance, but that page was ancient precisely because no one had ever interrupted the pattern it described. The writing did not disappear because the prophecy was wrong; it disappeared because you arrived exactly at the time it described and responded in a way that had never been written. The original phrase ended with the wound crossing you and moving on. Not the new one. First they changed a few words, then the whole last sentence began to rise from the page. The guardian reached out. His job was to conserve. Old things weren't modified for no reason. He thought something strange had entered the record. Then came the new phrase. It was shorter. No prediction, no grand title, no promise of reward, only one fact: the wound reached him and did not advance any further. That was your version. Here history changes. God did not celebrate because you had shown that the prophecy was wrong. The prophecy had fulfilled its function perfectly. It showed what a pattern produces when no one interrupts it. It was a map of inertia, and inertia is powerful, but inertia has no sovereignty. There is something that people often confuse when they talk about prophecies, patterns, curses, families, wounds, stories, and even personality. Something might explain where you're probably walking without the authority to decide where you end up. The old phrase knew the wound, knew what it had produced before, knew what those who carried it used to become, could read the story. The only thing she couldn't do was choose for you. That still belonged to him. So when the guardian tried to restore the original ending, God stopped him. The instruction was simple: keep both. Not because they both kept being true. One showed what was inherited; the other showed what was chosen. The old version was under the new one. It wasn't erased or hidden, because the sky didn't have to pretend that your story had always been beautiful. It wasn't. Something came to you that should never have come. Something cost him years. Something changed his way of sleeping, trusting, realizing danger. There were consequences. God did not call a wound a blessing just because you survived. The first version remained because the price had been real, but its phrase was written over, because the price did not receive the last word. That difference is the center of all this. You spent a lot of time wondering why certain things had to happen to you, and maybe some never get an answer that would satisfy you. But there's another question, much more important: what happened after what happened to you? That's when his authorship began. You didn't pick the first sentence. It was born inside parts of it. Other people wrote words about you before you were big enough to understand them: fear, silence, abandonment, anger, need to prove your worth, impulse to disappear when you need help, custom to expect a disappointment so that disappointment can never surprise you. You inherited vocabulary, but vocabulary doesn't mean final. And you proved it. So there were strange moments in his life when there seemed to be two versions of him at the same time. One made perfect sense; the other was harder. Someone lacked respect for you and a version knew exactly how to destroy it. The other one was leaving. Someone was cheating on you and one version wanted to make the next person pay for the damage caused by the previous one. The other recognized what was happening and stopped. Someone made you feel small and a version wanted power so no one would ever do that again. The other one wanted enough power to make sure that she would never turn into someone capable of doing that to someone else. It seemed like internal conflict, always seems, were corrections. You were looking at old words and deciding if they would enter the next draft. That's how you feel to rewrite a story inside. It almost never seems epic. It's usually uncomfortable because patterns are efficient. A pattern already knows what to do. He practiced. You have proof. You have arguments prepared. Freedom is slower. The freedom to, ask: to be justified and to be doing the right thing are really the same thing? And that little pause saved parts of you that probably didn't even know they survived. But there was something else that the ancient prophecy didn't say. Your review didn't end on you. Think of the people who came to your life after what hurt you the most. Some received a version of you that had no reason to wait. Someone came in scared

And you recognized this person's fear instead of taking advantage of him. Someone made a mistake around you and you corrected it without making him feel useless. Someone told you something you were ashamed of and you protected it. Someone expected you to abandon him and you remained long enough to teach that a conflict does not always mean abandonment. Someone asked for forgiveness and found that taking responsibility before you did not mean being humiliated. You probably never called any of these things prophecy. I was just trying to be a decent person. But that's how old things really end. Not with thunder, but when someone gets something different from you. I want you to save an image. Imagine a man receiving a glass full of bitter water. Your father drank from her, your grandfather too, and everyone heard the same instruction: you are thirsty. That's what there is. Drink. Then give the cup to your son. Until one day, the cup reaches a man who feels exactly the same thirst as all the previous ones. He lifts her up, he smells what's inside, and for the first time, someone asks a question that nobody had ever thought to ask: why do I need to pass this on to the next person? He doesn't pretend the glass is empty. You don't call sweet what's bitter. It simply pours the contents over the earth. The earth absorbs him, his hands tremble and he remains thirsty. That's the part that many stories omit. Breaking a pattern does not mean receiving immediately what you should have received in his place. Sometimes you are the first person who refuses to drink bitter water and yet you need to learn where to find clean water. That might seem deeply unfair. You interrupt the pattern and find that you still carry the consequences of receiving it. Forgive me and still have trouble trusting. Renounce revenge and in a few days you still wake up angry. Decide not to repeat your family and still listen to their voices within your own reactions. It comes out of a destructive relationship and still misses that person. Choose different and then wonder why choosing different didn't make you feel different immediately. Listen carefully. The prophecy changed at the time of your choice. Your nervous system doesn't change the speed of the paint. Your habits don't disappear because your direction has changed. Keeping healing doesn't show you chose wrong. Healing is just what can happen now because you chose another direction. The glass is already on the floor. Now you have to learn where the water is. And that is why God kept his version instead of turning the whole page into a clean and triumphant story. The scar on the record mattered. Someday, someone will need to know that the new phrase was written about an old one. Your story has no strength because you have never carried darkness. You have strength because someday someone will be able to look at you and understand that a person can carry darkness without giving it to the next. There's a difference. You're not here to turn into someone who's never been hurt. That person doesn't exist. You're turning into someone a wound can no longer use as transportation. And now comes the weirdest part. The guardian expected the page to close. That didn't happen. Underneath your new phrase came an empty space. It was never there. The ancient prophecy ended in you, not because your life ended, but because the pattern did not need to describe anything after the moment you would repeat it. Once repeated, the future was predictable again. The chain knew how to keep writing. But when you refused, the prediction ran out of words. For the first time in generations, there was no inherited phrase prepared for what would come next. Blank space. Do you understand how different this is from receiving the promise of a perfect future? They didn't give him a better prophecy. They gave us space. No sentence promised anything would be easy. No guarantee that no one would ever betray him again. None promise that the pain would stop visiting him. Just space. A place the old pattern was no longer allowed to fill. And God also kept that, the empty part, because that's the part you're living now. Maybe that explains something you've been feeling lately: not sure, almost the other way around. The strange feeling that your old version no longer fits, but your new life is not yet completely visible. Things you once tolerated now seem impossible. Reactions that once happened automatically now seem strange as they happen. Some relationships only worked while you agreed to play your old role. When he stopped doing that, the relationship found that he had no place left to support himself. Maybe you confused that void with being lost. You're not lost. It's somewhere that hasn't been written yet. And an unwritten space can scare you when your whole life has been organized around patterns. The patterns hurt, but they're known. Freedom at first may seem absent. There is no longer an ancient instruction dictating who you should be after, and that is why this stage requires even more courage than surviving. Survive question: Can you bear it? Freedom asks: now that nothing forces you to repeat that, what will you build in place? An old page can't answer that. It's up to you. And there's one last thing. The name of the prophecy has changed. Not your name, the name of the prophecy. For generations, she had been known for the wound she described. After its revision, this name ceased to make sense, because a prophecy whose last event is the repetition speaks of inheritance, but a prophecy whose last event is an interruption turns into something else: a testimony. That was the last change. It was no longer ?the wound that will continue?, but ?the place where it left off?. That is what God has kept. Not because your sentence was more correct than his, not because you surprised the one who created it. The part that

It deserved to be preserved was never information that God did not know. It was the evidence of what you did with the freedom he gave you. There's a difference between God knowing what a person can choose and a person really choosing that while they're hurt. One thing is knowledge; the other is character. And no one can write your character for you. Now come back with me to the beginning. An old page. A phrase that had survived for generations. A guardian watching the same wound advance towards the same end as always. And then you, no audience, no ceremony, not knowing that anything other than your room was watching. You had every reason to continue the sentence. It didn't go on. Words have changed. The guardian tried to restore them. God said, no. Keep them both. The first version shows what got to him. The second one, the one that came out of him. And between them is the story you've probably spent your whole life trying to understand. You were never chosen because nothing dark could reach you. He was chosen for what he did when it reached him. The prophecy was not broken. The chain, yes. And now there's a blank space after your name. 6 Meaning and interpretation. Do you realize the danger? The army could still create pain. What I couldn't control was the meaning. And whoever controls the meaning of an event controls what that event can become afterwards. That was his real power in that story. No invulnerability. Interpretation. The darkness could still send the event. They couldn't guarantee the conclusion. The luzinha fernando, let's call him Lucifer, realized something that the lower levels had lost: the battlefield had changed. They were still trying to control circumstances. You had begun to control what circumstances were allowed to teach. The normal war stopped working. Then the order changed. None

Unit could act against you without authorization. No coordinated pressure without review. No repeated tactics after being recognized. For a period of time the attacks decreased. Maybe you even remember a phase like this. It wasn't complete peace. It was something weirder. Quiet. After all this time living under pressure, space appeared. You thought something was over. I didn't. They were studying. And the study produced a conclusion that Lucifer didn't like it. There was no safe attack. Not because every attack failed, but because even success was beginning to be dangerous. The record gave a name for it: Reversion field. Not a magic shield. Something a lot more annoying for someone who was trying to control you. A condition in which hostile pressure begins to generate advantage for those who receive it. The better you stayed in extracting meaning from what happened, the stronger the reversal got. Until one unit made the mistake that ended everything. They ignored the restriction. They saw an opening. You were tired. A relationship was already unstable. There was a fear that had not yet healed completely. They believed their old version was still available. So they coordinated everything: pressure from the outside, an accusation coming from someone close, an unexpected loss and a voice inside your head repeating the oldest lie you carry on yourself. The training was accurate. It worked for a while. You started falling apart from the inside. He questioned advances he had already made. You almost decided to panic. Almost. Then something small happened. You recognized the sequence. Not just every event. The sequence. That was their mistake. The army repeated the architecture so accurately that for the first time you could see the entire plant. You stopped. It didn't solve everything. He didn't suddenly feel powerful. He simply refused to make the next expected move. That one refusal stopped the formation. The pressure needed your fear to make the charge convincing. The prosecution

I needed the isolation to generate despair. Loss needed despair to make the wrong opportunity attractive. And the inner voice needed that wrong choice to prove its own lie. You withdrew an answer. The chain couldn't finish. This is how systems collapse. It's not always destroying every piece. Sometimes just refuse the only movement around which all the pieces were built. Then the army turned against itself. Orders started colliding. One unit occupied another. Another one increased the pressure without authorization. Another tried to correct the attack and exposed who was being used against you. The training has lost coordination. And there is one important thing about a system built by fear. When it fails, it produces no union. Produces prosecution. Many people imagine evil as something perfectly united. It's not. Fear can organize. You can't build trust. An army sustained by domination remains united while domination seems to function. When it stops working, each part starts trying to save itself. That's exactly what happened when the final report came to Lucifer. There was no burst of anger. That came later. First there was silence. He read the sequence. Then you read it again. And you saw what no one wanted to write directly. The problem wasn't you anymore. The problem was the army. All parties had been trained to produce predictable answers. You didn't respond predictably enough. Worse. After so long trying to keep up with his adaptation, the army itself began to reveal its weaknesses through behavior. To keep sending units meant to expose more. More people would learn. More tactics would lose their usefulness. Lucifer took two strategic options: to withdraw the army and admit that a human target had forced the retreat. or eliminate the compromised structure before the failure spread. He chose to eliminate. That's what the title means. You didn't give Lucifer an order. No, no, no.

He defeated an army on his arm. You made that army too expensive to continue to exist. There's a difference. He began to dismantle the units built around his reactions. Connections broke. People who depended on your reaction disappeared. Situations sustained by his old role have collapsed. Old temptations lost power because the route had been exposed. Some conflicts simply ran out of structure. Maybe you interpreted this as people coming out of your life. Some went out. Not every ending is a cosmic event. But certain patterns don't survive when you stop completing them. A manipulator without his guilt loses the lever. A tease without his reaction loses the fun. A liar without his need to believe loses access. Who only values you while you're saved usually disappears when you stop saving. On the outside it looks like the person left. Within the standard the army lost a position. And now comes the most important part to your life: it does not rebuild what has collapsed. You've done this before! Something ends, silence appears, and because silence seems strange after years of living in chaos, you confuse the unknown with something wrong. So reopen the conversation, go back to the old environment, explain again, give the same person access under another name, try to restore something that only worked while you were abandoning yourself. Then he asks why the same war came back wearing other clothes. Listen carefully. Some forms of peace seem empty because chaos used to give you a function. When no one's attacking, you need to find out who you are without defending yourself. When no one needs to be saved, you need to decide where your energy goes. When you stop living to prove others wrong, you need to build something that continues to exist even if they never do. That's where you're going, not for a life without opposition. For a life where opposition no longer decides what its strength will be used for.

For years, strength meant resistance: hold on longer, survive longer, recover faster, keep standing. That was necessary. But strength has another stage: construction. What can you build with the attention you once spent watching the danger? What happens when intelligence is used to identify manipulation? Start identifying opportunity. When the discipline created by delays remains before something good, long enough to see it grow. When limits turned into structure for healthy relationships, not walls. This is how the reversal ends. You don't win by spending the rest of your life studying the enemy. You win when what you learned from the enemy ceases to be about him. There is a time when discernment needs to turn direction. Otherwise, you remain psychologically still on a battlefield that has already been closed. And there was one last thing Lucifer realized when he decided to destroy the army: it was not only that the army had failed. He had helped form a version of you that Lucifer himself could never build. Think about it: patience, pattern recognition, the ability to leave, wait before responding, survive being misunderstood, rebuild after losing, perceive manipulation without having to expose everyone. None of this came completely ready. Some of these skills were born because life forced you to practice. That doesn't make what happened good. Don't confuse both. A wound doesn't turn into something fair because you managed to hold it. A betrayal does not become a blessing just because it taught discernment. What was wrong remains wrong, but the error does not receive exclusive ownership of what comes next. That's your part. You decide what survives the event. Pain can survive, memory and scar too, but instruction doesn't need it. The event can say: Never trust me again. You can answer: Am I gonna trust you differently? You can say: Be cool. You answer: I'll be lucid. You can say: Prove your worth. You responds: I'll build it quietly. You can say: Make them regret it. You answer: Their opinion will no longer direct my life. This is the field of reversal in the most practical form: not spiritual immunity, the refusal to allow hostility to write the next instruction. When this becomes consistent, any hostile system encounters a serious problem: it can still touch its circumstances, but it can no longer recruit its own answer so easily. That's why the army had to disappear. An army is only useful if, at some point, the target starts working against himself. You stopped cooperating. And when sufficient parts of the training depended on their participation, Lucifer was forced to destroy what was left. Now go back to the beginning. Remember the last time someone tried to hurt you and ended up damaging your own position. Maybe now you see it differently. Not every collapse in an enemy's life is divine punishment. Not every consequence is related to you. Don't wait for someone to fall. That would just be another way to keep organizing your life around that person. The important part is simpler: what you tried to reduce you showed where you still delivered your size. What you tried to confuse taught clarity. What made you chase taught you to stand still. What tried to make you hate yourself showed the price of abandoning yourself. They didn't give you those things. You extracted it. That difference belongs to you. And now the army no longer occupies its place. Don't just stand there and wait for the other one to show up. Build it. 7

Functional tip: Don't ever come out against a guy in a helmet! Basic rule. 8 You gonna kill people? Go on, it's already killing! It's spiritual.

9 He only suffers from rejection who needs external validation to prove his own ego! For those who see themselves as 'normal?', without any extra value that differentiates them from others! You really need that validation. 10 Stop what spiritual identity becomes arrogance. That's why he had to start learning from underneath. (((11) He received an order: load by the end of the day. That's all. He'd carried soul seals before. I knew how they were supposed to be. Yours almost dropped him on his face. Before the day ended, he asked a question that silenced everything around. What kind of human needs a stamp like that? No one answered. Then he looked closer. And that's when you discovered something you should never have found out. Your seal didn't exist to identify you. It existed to limit you. You're not necessarily better than the others. He's not above anyone. But it's like a part of you understood things that your own life never taught. Because that day explains a lot more than it looks. There's something people get wrong about a stamp. He can show who something belongs to. But also keep something from opening up before time. Yours has been with you for so long, you don't even feel the pressure anymore. This happens to everything that goes with someone from the beginning. Those born by the sea stop listening to the waves. Those who live near a train line learn to sleep with the noise. And those who enter life under pressure end up calling it normal. You called it personality. That mind that almost never stops watching. The feeling that there's always another layer behind what someone says. The way certain environments tire you out before anything even happens. The lack of something you can't even name. The desire to be understood mixed with the tiredness of explaining. You thought you were just born that way. In a way, he was born. But it exists a time when certain seals need to be examined. Everything done to contain pressure needs to be tested someday. A container is inspected. A limit is checked. When his turn came, an angel received the task of carrying his seal while he was examined. Receive. Charge. Return. One day. That's it? He put his hands on the seal and immediately heard something. A knock. Your heart. That shouldn't happen. A stamp records the identity. It doesn't reproduce experience. He set his hands. The crash got stronger. Then something else came. Wait. Not the idea of waiting. The human experience of waiting. For the first time he understood what it means to need an answer and not know when it will come. You felt the nights you wanted to be sure and received just one more morning. The decisions you made without knowing if they would work. The times he asked for God's direction and still had to choose before he saw the road. The angel almost released the seal. Not because it was heavy on my hands. Because there was uncertainty inside him. He had seen humans waiting. Seeing is not carrying. Then came the memory. Not your memories like images. Their weight. You felt like something from years ago can come back in one piece because of a sentence. A look. A known silence. You understand how anyone can know you're safe while the body prepares for a danger that's over. And then, in the midst of all that, joy came. That confused him even more. Because the pain hadn't left first. Joy existed beside her. He felt you laugh while a part of your life fell apart. It felt a song reach you on a day when words couldn't. It felt like you were taking care of someone while you were carrying problems that that person didn't even know. The angel imagined that emotions worked in sequence. First the mourning ends. Then the joy begins. First the fear ends. Then the courage begins. Your seal showed something else. A human being can carry opposite feelings at the same time. Missing someone and knowing she shouldn't come back. Love and go. Forgive and remember. Feeling scared and continuing. Question God and still talk to him. And somehow the contradiction doesn't destroy you. It becomes part of the human experience. That's when the angel stopped asking how much the seal weighed and asked something else. What's that holding? The moment you asked the question, marks appeared on the surface. Restrictions. One limited perception. Another one, intensity. Another one, memory. But underneath them was something he had never seen around a common human life. A limit on memory. The angel froze. Now he understood why in some moments of your life you felt like you were trying to remember something you never learned. The seal wouldn't erase you. It controlled the speed with which certain reconnaissances returned. You know how this works. There are truths you heard several times before you finally understood them. The information hasn't changed. You've changed. The seal followed the same logic. Not everything inside you could reach consciousness at once. That's why certain things came in fragments. A strange familiarity with an idea. A dream that stayed in your head too long. A person you seemed to understand too quickly. A phrase coming at the right time. That sudden feeling I know. Most of the time you missed it. Good. It was supposed to be like this. Because the goal was never to make you spend your life obsessed with proving where you came from. It was to make you live where you are. Choose. Wrong. Love. Build. What existed before this life couldn't make those decisions for you in here. And now the angel understood the first function of the seal. He wasn't containing something evil. I was making something bigger compatible with something smaller. Imagine trying to take an ocean into a room. The ocean doesn't go in like the ocean. He needs a container. The edges of the container do not decrease water. They allow her to be in that space. Your human life is the fourth. The seal is the edge. And for a day someone else

I was carrying that. Because the angel had not yet found the part of the seal that would make him ask if you were really human. As he carried the seal, something strange began to happen to you. For the first time part of that pressure wasn't there. You didn't gain supernatural powers. Something weird has happened. You were quiet. Things that normally required your attention seemed smaller. You've lost the will to explain yourself. To prove something. To chase after those who had already shown where they wanted to be. To win useless arguments. For a few hours you got closer to yourself without the usual compression. And what came up was not power. It was peace. That surprised the angel. If the seal was holding something huge, he'd expect intensity. But when part of the restriction came out, you got simpler. The approval of others has lost importance. The comparison has lost power. Revenge no longer seems interesting. The need to be understood by those who insisted on understanding you wrong almost disappeared. You didn't remember another existence. He just stopped taking this one so personally. The angel felt love. Change through the seal, your heart slowed down, the noise inside it decreased. Then something started pressing the last restriction. He had been ordered to carry, not investigate, but at that point he needed to understand what he was holding. Then he touched the last mark, a single line opened. No explosion, no voice. Just one sentence. The angel read it, then read it again: Do not remove completely while incarnated. One word changed everything: incarnate. Not born, not raised, incarnate. He looked at you: a human body, a human history, human pain, human needs. Everything seemed normal. Then why did the seal call your condition an incarnation? He looked at the marks again and realized something that had previously gone unnoticed: his seal did not start when you were born. He came in with you. That's when the angel finally asked: What kind of human needs that? A

The answer came from behind him: the one who agreed to forget. The angel knew the voice. God did not explain what you had been before. That's not what mattered. Explained why forgetting mattered. If you entered a test knowing all the answers, there would be no proof. If you remember exactly who you were before you were rejected, rejection could never ask who you believe it was. If you knew the meaning of every loss before you felt it, trusting in the middle of loss would cost you nothing. If you remembered the whole purpose before the confusion, you would never find out if you could choose a direction even without seeing everything. So the seal didn't make you smaller, it made the experience real. You needed to feel uncertainty like uncertainty, loneliness like loneliness, rejection as rejection, choice as choice. Otherwise, your life would be theater and it should never be theater. That was the reason for the seal: not punishing you with ignorance, protecting the value of your choices. But the angel still had one question: why so many restrictions? Why limit perception? Why limit intensity? Why make the recon come back slowly? God answered with another question: What happens when someone remembers too much before they understand why they had to forget? The angel knew: the person stops living forward, is fascinated by the origin, ((turns identity into flight, transforms difference into superiority and the mission disappears behind the obsession with itself. This was the second function of the seal: to prevent spiritual identity from becoming arrogance. Listen to this carefully: being chosen does not mean being better, function is not hierarchy. A bridge is no greater than the banks it connects, a light is no more valuable than the person who needs to see and carry something different does not give anyone the right to reduce others. That's why you needed to learn from underneath. I needed to know what it's like to be ignored, misunderstood, weak, wrong, uncertain. He needed to respect human fragility by living within it. And that's when the mission began to change the angel. He watched humans for ages, knew fear, grief, doubt, impatience. But knowing that something exists is not the same as carrying it. For a day, he understood why courage matters when a body can be hurt, why trust matters when there is betrayal, why forgiveness matters when memory remains, why faith matters when there is no certainty. He always knew eternity existed, but knowing that there is eternity does not make a night of pain seem shorter for those who are still inside that night. Upstairs perspective is not experience inside. So he understood the intelligence behind the seal. He didn't hide his greatness, he gave weight to his decisions. Goodness means more when irritation is real. Courage means more when there is fear. Integrity means more when no one would find out if you betrayed your own values. Forgiveness means more when you still remember. Without limitations some virtues would cost nothing. With limits they became character. The angel finally understood why something other than a common human identity would accept living one. Not to demonstrate power, but to make choices that power alone would never make meaningful. And this is where the title changes meaning. When the angel realized that you were not only human, he did not begin to see mankind as something inferior. On the contrary, he began to respect it even more, because what existed in you beyond this experience had accepted to enter it without shortcuts, without permanent memory of what came before, without emotional immunity, without guarantee of always recognizing oneself, without protection against disappointment. You came through the same door. That's why the seal needed to be strong. Not because you were dangerous, because the experience needed to remain true. The end of the day approached, the seal became heavier, not because something new had entered it, he wanted to return. You started feeling that, too. That strange peace was diminishing, his mind was restless, his responsibilities regained the usual size. Something seemed missing, although you couldn't say what. O

Angel was ordered to return the seal, but first asked for one thing: he wanted to see what the seal considered important in his life. Permission was given, the seal opened and what appeared surprised him: no throne, no epic battle, no time when thousands of people knew his name. He saw something small: once you could have humiliated someone and didn't. Then another: you helped a person who couldn't offer anything in return. Another one was angry with God and chose to be honest rather than pretend. Another you made a mistake, felt shame and came back. Then one more came up: someone hurt you enough to make it understandable if you turned cruel. No one would know what was going on inside you and yet you wouldn't let that completely decide who you would become. The angel understood: it was for these moments that the seal existed. If you remembered everything, if you knew exactly who it was, if you could see the sky watching every decision you made, would those choices be the same weight? Nope. You chose to feel ordinary, unsure, without applause, without proof that anyone would ever know. The seal made that possible. For the first time the angel bowed his head, not to worship you, to respect the price of a human choice. The mission was to examine what your seal holds. In the end, his seal had changed the observer. Then the day is over. The seal came back to you. Maybe you just felt your normal mind coming back. The noise returned, the problems recovered the size, the distance disappeared, the concern with tomorrow returned, but something had changed. What the seal protects came back with a mark, the mark of the angel's hand, carried that long enough for the seal to record who held it. Underneath the mark was a phrase. The angel asked permission to leave her there. God has allowed it. It said: Now I understand why they forget. That phrase goes on with you, not to make you spend your life trying to remember everything, almost the opposite. It exists for the days when you get frustrated with your own limits, when asks why he does not see further, why the answers take longer, why he still fights with something he found healed, why one day God seems close and the next seems silent. Don't turn silent days into proof against you. Recognition comes in parts, because parts can be lived. You don't need to know everything you are to be the one you need today. And be careful how it feels to be different. Difference can also become prison when someone begins to love it. You're not here to spend your life proving you're different. If there's something in common with you, it should make you more capable of understanding someone else, not less. Look at what happened to the angel. He started the day wanting to find out why you were different, ended up understanding humanity better. That's the direction. The deeper you go, the less you need to diminish others, the less need to prove, less comparison, less obsession with enemies, less desire to see who hurt you publicly repenting, more responsibility, more discernment, more peace. Maybe that's why parts of your seal can appear now. You're less interested in opening it for show. You don't need everyone to know what you're carrying. You just need the recognition needed for the next step, enough to understand the next pattern, get out of the wrong place, recognize the right place, stop fighting yourself just because you can't see the whole road. They never promised the whole road, just enough light to go on. The angel began the mission thinking he was carrying proof of who you were, ended up understanding why he might not know. That's the secret to the seal. He doesn't hide you because heaven is ashamed. He hides a part of you, of yourself, so your choices can still be yours. Now go back to the beginning. For one day, something was taken away. An angel carried the pressure you called normal throughout your life, felt your waiting, your memory, your contradictions, your uncertainty, then found the restrictions, opened a line: do not remove completely while incarnate and finally understood: humanity was not simply what you were, it was an experience that you accepted to live whole. This means getting tired, getting confused, making mistakes, learning slowly, loving people who can't always understand you, losing things you thought would remain, having days when God seems close and days when you don't hear anything. Don't waste this experience trying to escape it. What came before can wait, what comes after. You're here now and this is where your choices have weight. 12 The worst of today's pattern is not even Cain who kills Abel, because he runs away. The saddest thing is for Adam and Eve who never know what happened to them. 13 Meet selected pages before choosing your edition. Replicate your perceptions, use your words, or dress your wisdom, only added interest to the karmic debt. You did the inside job and now the universe is liquidating the account in your favor. Your victory is no longer a future hope. It is a consummate fact that reality is just beginning to convey. They're trapped in the movie that ended, trying to reverse the score, but you've already changed the channel. The rise you experienced changed the physics of the game for everyone. But if their defeat is already guaranteed and the charge is inevitable, have you ever stopped to think why the universe allows this comedy to continue and what is the final role of this exhibition in its total sovereignty? You've spent too much time trying to prove your worth for what you do, for the effort you put in. But your true strength is not a muscle that flexes. It's the vibration of your conscience. It's your being who's doing the heavy lifting, not your doing. While others desperately try to copy their movements, they fail because they cannot copy the unique frequency of their soul. You don't have to run to win or force results. You just need to be aligned with your deepest truth. It's this silent authenticity that disarms everyone who tries to compete. Remember, while they strive and seek external strategies, you are in divine flux. They're using brute force, trying to break down doors that the universe opened to you gently. Your simple presence exposes their performance and artificiality without you having to lift a finger. You're not in the competition anymore. You're demonstrating a totally different level of play, where the only rule is to be sovereign about who you are. This truth resonates louder and shakes the foundation of any lie. The game you play has already transcended the dimension of opposition. You won, not because you fought, but because you ascended to a new rank. Pay attention to this, if your strength lies in the memory of the identity you conquered, what you will do when the universe

Start revealing the mirror layers of that consciousness, remember that even you don't know everything that exists yet! Prepare yourself, for the next phase of revelation is not about what they think of you, but about the infinite capacity that expects to be accessed in yourself, from you by you high precision and totally autonomous. You're discovering a truth that breaks the game. Your invincibility is born from your refusal to fight. You no longer need to spend energy battling cheap imitations or proving their worth. The paradox is this: the less you strive to defend yourself, the more the universe moves to protect you. You've raised your frequency and that's enough. While others run to try to imitate their light, this imitation serves only as a spotlight, revealing how empty and desperate their stage is. Its authenticity has become the solvent that dissolves the entire farce of others. Understand that your strength is not in your actions, but in your inner alignment. They may even copy your words or your movements, but they can never falsify the wounds that have become wisdom within you. They studied their ascension as scientists, cataloging every external success, but failed to note that their power base is entirely internal. While you build your empire from the inside out, they're exhausted trying to maintain a facade that demands your energy as a currency. You're not just winning, you already won from the moment you stopped playing their game. This freedom to no longer have to confront mediocrity is not the end of the journey, but the gateway to a new dimension of existence. You have freed yourself from the need for approval, but now you face a new reality. The universe is reorganizing around you with amazing speed. What happens when your power is no longer measured by won battles, but by the ease and speed with which reality bends to your will? What will you do now with this unbelievable acceleration of your destiny? You don't need proof anymore.

Outside to know what's true. His body turned into a high-precision lie detector. That weird feeling in the stomach, the chill in the back of the head, that's not anxiety. It's your internal system screaming: falsehood alert! Your intuition is working as a cosmic GPS, guiding you away from forced energies and people who try to copy your glow. You are now the final judge of your reality and your body delivers the verdict before your mouth even opens. While others desperately try to dress your frequency, your movements and using your words, you feel the difference as a shrill mud. They want to hitchhike their ascent, but imitation only speeds up exposure. Your light is not an accessory that can be purchased. It's the result of wounds transmuted in wisdom. They seek the stage without preparation and that is why their performance becomes the cosmic joke that life itself makes a point of transmitting to everyone. His evolution changed the rules of the game and the physics of his life. You stopped looking for the truth outside and started feeling it inside. But now that you can see through all the masks and detect every deviation from reality, a deeper question arises: if your presence dissolves all that is false, what exactly will remain of your reality when you finally stop nourishing anything that is not 100% authentic? Do you notice the noise they make? It's the sound of blows being thrown, but they're hitting the air. They memorized your old frequency, that version of you that was still vulnerable, but you don't live at that address anymore. You went upstairs. 20 Moving on to the cross, ripping off several heads along the way! Having fun heading for the target. 21 If you knew how much, and since when do we have dreams of revelations? You would finally understand that the life of dreams is more real than the Experienced, really short. 27 Let me take you to the place where there is this information that few understand yet in life, is the standard error of the religious, insisting that the harvest only comes after that life. Stay focused, because that's important. There is a spiritual economy that operates parallel to the physical economy. In this economy, gifts of the soul have values assigned. Not arbitrary values. Values based on rarity, impact potential, transformation capacity. Most people never think about it. They live their lives without realizing that they carry internal treasures that overcome any material wealth. But spiritual entities know this perfectly, especially those who operate in darkness. They can see what humans cannot see. They can understand the value of a soul. They can measure the potential of a gift. And when they detect something extraordinarily valuable,

They activate specific protocols to acquire it. You've activated one of those protocols, not recently, since you arrived in this world. Because what you carry inside you is something the kingdom of darkness has desperately sought. Not to destroy it. That would be easy to understand. To buy it. To get it. To make you voluntarily deliver it in exchange for something that seems valuable, but it's not. This is important for you to understand. The enemy of your soul operates under rules he cannot violate. One of those rules is free will. He can't take what's yours without your consent. He can't steal your gift. He can't take it from you by force. He can only do one thing: offer you something in return. Convince you to hand him over voluntarily. Make the exchange assent to you when, in reality, you're losing infinitely more than you earn. This has happened in your life more than you realize. Every time they offered you a shortcut that compromised your integrity, it was a purchase offer. Every time an opportunity appeared that required you to betray your values, it was a purchase offer. Every time the easy way came right when the right way got rough, it was a purchase offer. The devil has been dealing with you. And you, unknowingly, have rejected his offers. One after another. Year after year. And that made him absolutely frustrated. Because your gift remains intact. It remains in your possession. It keeps growing in value while he still can't get it. Now let me explain exactly what this gift you carry. It's not something you learned. It's not a skill you've developed. It is something that has come into your soul since the moment of your creation. Its forbidden gift is the ability to remain pure in corrupt environments. Let me explain why this is worth trillions. In the spiritual world, purity is the most valuable currency there is. I'm not talking about perfection. I'm not talking about never going wrong. I'm talking about something much deeper. I'm talking about that one part of you that, no matter what you've been through, no matter what mistakes you've made, no matter what falls you've had, stays fundamentally intact. That part that refuses to corrupt itself completely. That part that, after every stumbling block, seeks to rise. That part that feels uncomfortable in dark environments because it just doesn't belong to them. That's unusually rare. Most people, when repeatedly exposed to darkness, eventually adapt to them. It becomes part of them, stops feeling discomfort, normalizes what should be unacceptable. But not you. You were exposed to things that should have corrupted you. You've been through environments that should have turned you into something dark. He faced temptations that should have corroded his essence. And something inside you just refused. This is your forbidden gift. It's forbidden because the system of the world doesn't want it to exist. Darkness needs everyone to eventually corrupt. They need purity to be gradually eliminated. They need every soul to eventually yield and join the low frequency. But you're an anomaly. An error in the corruption matrix. Someone who should have fallen a long time ago, but remains unexplainably standing. That has incalculable value. Because every person who maintains his purity in a corrupt world becomes a point of light that illuminates others. It becomes living evidence that it is possible not to give in. It becomes the incarnate hope for those who thought corruption was inevitable. Your simple existence, your simple persistence in remaining who you really are, has the power to transform realities, to awaken others, to remind them that they too can resist. That's what's worth trillions. Not for what you can do. For what you are. For what you represent. By the possibility that you demonstrate every day that you refuse to become what the world wants you to be. Now let me show you the specific offers the enemy has made for you. Because when you understand his tactics, you do.

to recognize them more easily in the future. The first offer is called the offering of immediate relief. This offer comes when you're at your lowest point, when the pain is intense, when the pressure is unbearable, when you feel you can't take another day. Right now, an exit appears. But that exit has a price. It requires you to compromise something of your essence, accept something that goes against your values, take a shortcut that takes you away from who you really are. The offer says I can take away that pain now. You just have to do it. And what you need to do always involves delivering a part of your gift. Your integrity. Its authenticity. Your purity. Think about the times this happened in your life. Moments of despair where a solution appeared that seemed too good. An opportunity that would solve everything. A person offering you exactly what you needed. But something didn't feel right. Something inside you even doubted that your logical mind could find no reason to doubt it. And eventually that offer revealed its true nature. It turned out to be something different than I promised. It had hidden costs. It would have required sacrifices that were not worth it. Those moments were buying offers and your instinctive rejection was your gift protecting you. The second offer is called the offer of belonging. This is particularly effective with chosen ones. Because chosen often feel alone, misunderstood, as if they belonged nowhere. And that loneliness hurts. This feeling of being different, of not fitting, of being perpetually outside looking inside is exhausting. Then the offer appears. A group that accepts you. People who seem to understand you. A place where you could finally belong. But to belong, you need to adapt. It needs to change certain things about you. You need to abandon certain values that make you different. You need to reduce certain parts of your light so as not to make others uncomfortable. This is a purchase offer disguised as community. The entry price is a portion of its authenticity. And once you start paying, the debt just grows. Think of the times they asked you to be less yourself to be accepted. To hide your light so you don't stand out. To silence your truth so as not to make others uncomfortable. To abandon your path to follow that of others. These were buying offers. And here's what's beautiful: you rejected them. Not consciously. You didn't know you were in a spiritual negotiation. But something inside you just couldn't do that. Something inside you preferred loneliness from being authentic to false company from being someone you're not. That something is your gift operating, protecting you, keeping you in yourself, even when you didn't understand why you couldn't just give in like everyone else. The third offer is called the recognition offer. This is especially tempting for chosen ones who have been ignored, belittled, or made invisible. After years of not being seen by who you really are, after having your value constantly questioned, after giving so much and receiving so little recognition, someone or something appears that finally sees your greatness, that finally recognizes your value, that finally offers you the recognition you have earned your whole life. But there is one condition. To receive this recognition you need to use it in a way, you need to direct your gift to purposes that are not really yours, you need to shine, but under terms that someone else establishes. That's the subtlest offer, because it doesn't look bad. You finally seem to get what you deserve. But the price is your autonomy, your freedom to use your gift as your soul knows it must be used. Now let me explain why the devil cannot simply steal his gift, because this is the part that changes everything: free will is a universal law that even the enemy cannot violate. It was established from the beginning of creation and although he hates that law with every fiber of his fallen being, he cannot avoid it. Your gift has been given to you. It's yours. It belongs to you by divine right and only you can decide what to do with it. No one can take it from you without your consent. No one can pull him out against his will. No one can force you to turn him in. That is why the enemy is limited to tactics of persuasion, to offerings, to temptations, to making the exchange assent. But the final decision is always, always, always yours. And it pisses him off, because he's been throwing his best offers at you for years. He used moments of weakness, enjoyed desperate seasons, employed people who seemed trustworthy, created circumstances that seemed to leave you no choice and you kept saying no. Not with words. Not consciously. But something inside you continued to reject each offering, continued to choose integrity rather than relief, continued to prefer the difficult path to the corrupt shortcut, continued to remain faithful to something you could not even name, but knew it was valuable. That something was your forbidden gift, operating silently, protecting you from sales that you would have eternally repented. Now let me give you the evidence that this has happened in your life. First evidence: you experienced suspiciously timely offers. Think of moments in your life where just when you were more desperate, a solution appeared that seemed too good, an opportunity that would solve everything, a person offering exactly what you needed, but something didn't seem right. Something inside you even doubted that your logical mind could find no reason to doubt it. And eventually that offer revealed its true nature. Second evidence: the wrong people were attracted to you. Not attracted in a good way, attracted in the sense of wanting something from you, wanting to extract something, wanting to associate with you not for who you are, but for what you carry. You noticed that certain people seem to want to be near you for no apparent reason. They come to you, they flatter you, they try to win their trust and eventually reveal intentions that are not pure. This is because your gift emits a frequency and that frequency attracts both those who want to learn from you and those who want to take advantage of you. The enemy sends people to make his purchase offers, to convince you to give up what he can't take. And you had to learn to discern between genuine admiration and disguised manipulation. Third evidence: you felt unexplained protection at critical times. Situations where logically you should have made the wrong decision, where all the pressure pushed you the wrong way, where you had no strength of your own to resist, but something intervened. Something stopped you. Something changed the circumstances just in time. Something gave you clarity at the exact moment you needed. This protection is not a coincidence, it is a response to the value of what you carry, because the sky actively protects those who carry gifts of high value, not for the gift to be preserved without use, but for the right time for its full manifestation to come. Fourth evidence: you have experienced scarcity in areas where others have plenty. That might seem a contradiction. If you carry something so valuable, why did you have so many frouls? But here is spiritual truth: scarcity was protection because premature abundance would have been used as another purchase offering. If you had received everything you wanted before you were ready, you would have been more vulnerable to offerings that seemed to complete what you needed. The shortage kept you hungry for the right things, kept you from settling for cheap substitutes, forced you to seek something real instead of accepting imitations. The shortage was a form of protection for your gift. Uncomfortable, yes. Painful, absolutely. But effective in keeping you out of the range of offers that would have cost a lot more than they were worth. Fifth evidence: you feel that something big is about to manifest. There's an anticipation within you that you can't explain completely, a feeling that all you've been through is building towards something, that the rejections of the enemy's offerings were not in vain, that your preserved gift is about to find its purpose. This feeling is spiritual perception. Your soul knows what your mind still cannot fully comprehend. Something is changing, something is aligning, something is preparing to manifest and everything is connected to the gift you protected without knowing you were protecting. Now let me tell you what happens when the devil fails to buy a gift, because that's what's happening in your case. After years of rejected offers, something changes the enemy's strategy. Not because he gives up. He doesn't give up. But because he recognizes that certain souls will not sell, no matter what he offers, no matter how attractive he makes the exchange, no matter how desperate the situation is. Some souls are simply not for sale. And you're one of them. When this reality is confirmed in spiritual records, when it is documented that a soul consistently rejected every purchase offer, something different is activated. The focus changes from acquisition to containment. If they can't buy you, at least they'll try to limit you. If they can't acquire your gift, at least they'll try to stop you from using it. If they can't have you on their side, at least they'll try to neutralize you. That's the phase you're in. Attacks designed not to make you sell, but to keep you so busy surviving that you cannot manifest what you carry. Constant problems draining your energy. Distractions that consume your attention. Situations that keep you in survival mode, rather than on purpose. But here is what the enemy did not calculate: that the same resistance that made you reject his offers also makes you impossible to contain permanently. That the same gift you protected now protects you. That the purity you preserved in times of corruption now becomes power that cannot be limited.

You're entering a new phase, the phase where your gift stops being just something you protect and becomes something you actively use. And the enemy knows it. So the recent attacks were more intense. So the circumstances were harder. That's why you felt more pressure than ever. It's the last attempt at restraint before your gift manifests itself in its fullness. But it's too late to stop him. What's coming your way can't be blocked. The rejections you made, the offers you refused, the trades you refused to make, all this accumulated something: Spiritual Credit. And that credit is about to become tangible manifestation. Let me explain how this works. In the spiritual economy, every time you reject a corrupt offer, something is deposited in your account. It's not money. It's something more valuable. It's authority. It's influence. It's impact capability. Every no you said to the enemy was a yes you said to the purpose. Each rejected offer was an investment in its future. Every resisted temptation was a brick in the construction of its destiny. And now this building is almost complete. The pieces are in place. The moment is coming. What you've protected for so long is about to be revealed to the world and it's going to be bigger than you think. Because the value of a gift doesn't diminish when it's preserved. It increases. It accumulates interest. Get some power. Your gift today is worth infinitely more than it was worth when you started protecting it. Because every test you passed added a depth layer. Every temptation you resisted added a layer of power. Each offer you rejected added a layer of authority. What you will manifest is not just the original gift. It's the original gift plus everything you invested in it through years of protection. Now let me give you the final instruction: what do you need to do with this revelation? First, you need to recognize what you've done. You haven't just been surviving. You've been protecting something invaluable. Every day you didn't give in was a win. Each

The moment you kept your integrity was a triumph. Every moment you chose the hard way instead of the corrupt shortcut was an investment in your destiny. Stop seeing your story as a series of meaningless fights. Start seeing it as the successful protection of a treasure worth trillions. Second, you need to prepare for the demonstration. What you protected is ready to be used. But using it requires intent. It takes conscience. It requires you to stop just protecting and start designing. Your gift to remain pure in corrupt environments is not just for you. It's to light up others. It's to show that it's possible. It's to give hope to those who believe corruption is inevitable. Start looking for opportunities to be light where there is darkness. Not by force. In a natural way. Simply being who you are in places where who you are is exactly what is needed. Third, you need to be alert for final offers. Because they'll come. When the enemy feels he's losing, he makes final offers. Offers more attractive than all the previous ones. Offers designed to make you question whether it was really worth rejecting everything before. Don't give in now. Not after everything you've protected. Not when you're so close to the full demonstration. The next offers will be the most seductive of your life, but they will also be the last. Resist them and you will have crossed a threshold that can no longer be reversed. Now let me share with you what was recorded about your case. When a soul consistently rejects the enemy's offerings, this is documented. A special note is added to that person's spiritual archive. Your note says something you need to hear. It says: this soul has demonstrated incorruptibility under extreme conditions. Incorruptibility. Not perfection. No absence of mistakes. Incorruptibility. The ability to remain fundamentally intact, regardless of circumstances. This classification changes how you are treated by heaven. It changes what kind of assignments you get.

It changes what level of trust is placed on you. It changes how big the doors open. Because heaven seeks people in whom it can trust important treasures. People who won't sell what's entrusted to them when the right offer comes along. People who have demonstrated through years of testing that their loyalty is not for sale. You're one of those people. And the assignments coming your way will reflect that level of trust. Finally, you need to understand the message that was specifically recorded for you. Not a generic message. A message for your specific situation. She says this: to you who protected what was given to you, you did something that few people can. You kept your essence intact in a world designed to corrupt it. He rejected offers that others would have accepted without thinking. You chose temporary pain instead of permanent corruption. That didn't go unnoticed. Every rejection has been recorded. Every resistance has been noted. Every time you chose the hard one, but right, instead of the easy but wrong one, something was added to your account. This account is full now. What's coming your way is the result of everything you invested. It's not luck. It's not a coincidence. It's return on investment. Purity investment. Resistance. Your forbidden gift will stop being forbidden. It became his greatest instrument. Unwittingly you have a profound impact. What the enemy wanted to buy is exactly what he most regretted for, in addition to failing to acquire, legitimately removed all the authority he thought he had, demoralized it in front of everyone, many witnesses now talk about it. You'll use it even more to free others from the same offers you rejected. Walk looking only ahead, knowing that its value is not negotiable. That what you carry is priceless. No offer, no matter how attractive you look, is worth what it would cost you to sell it. You're a guardian, and this treasure is worth trillions. You've proven yourself worthy of this responsibility, and now you get the reward for it.

28 The third time I died. It was a Thursday morning, around 9:00. The day of the month was 22/08/2013, just over two weeks ago that I had completed my work for Itaú, it was two years delivering projects of collection centers, URAs, interfaces with those companies that had been calling you swearing you had a debt with them. Anyway, you signed the benheê contract. The same week a friend of mine got me a job as a salesman at a supplement store at the Polo Shopping in Indaiatuba. It was a new experience for me, I was dominating that subject already, I met, with +- two weeks in this work, then arrived the day 22/08/13, it was a Thursday and this friend who got me the job, who also worked with me would take off, it was his day off, everyone who craps in shopping knows that it is usually a one-off in the middle of the week. And he had warned me several times on Wednesday, on August 21, 13. That on the 22nd of the year, he'd be off. He made it a point to remind me of his day off the next day because we were going with him in the same car, one week with his car and the other with mine. It happened that, even though he warned me many times about his day off the next day, I forgot, and I drove my car to his house in the neighborhood of Cafezal 7 in Itupeva, counting on leaving my car there to, as usual, take his car. As expected, he wasn't. Of course, it was the guy's only week off, he'd gone out, he was asleep, or he wasn't even home yet, I don't remember exactly. The point is, in that one, I dropped my record 'it was his day off, he shouldn't even be home, I'm going alone with my car'. Only there's a detail on the Itupeva-Indaiatuba route. There is no gas station, so I needed to return from Cafezal 7 which in thesis is the last starting from the center of Itupeva, to the nearest post before returning to the path that would take me to Indaiatuba to Polo Shopping. High risk combination: wet asphalt, was Raining, haste I had forgotten that my friend had warned me of his day off, worried about not being late for a job that already had another seller in the store that had opened the 'Perfect Form' store at 10hs at the right time and didn't even know that I would work that day. In the descent of the Cafezal 1 direction center, I went down to about 80, bordering 90k/h without safety belt, at the turn of the tower, the 'black curve', my car, a black goal 2008, the year was 2013 I saw as a zero car, did not make the curve even if I did it with the steering wheel, the asphalt was wet, did not give enough adhesion, the car about 80k/h was straight and hit face with a white Sprinter that was climbing the Cafezal. At impact, I saw it all in slow camera. I remember the details, everything passed very slowly before me, it seems that the brain releases a hormonal charge much higher than the pattern that allows you to have a quick enough reaction for you to do something that saves you. I understood that I was without the belt, so I flexed all the muscles of the body with attention in the arms and hands holding the steering wheel. And then the blow came, it was strong, more than I could bear, my hands let go of the steering wheel, even though I concentrated to hold it hard, I remember the sound of the shock I made with the chest, that involuntary hrraaannnn. The force still throws my chest on the steering wheel, for the lack of a seat belt, where I absorbed this main impact with four ribs and neck, again neck. rsrs. The crash went head-on on both cars, but as it was the left end of my car with the right end of the Sprinter, both cars rotated without overturning and stopped in the opposite direction as before. My car coming down looked like it was going up the right lane and the van, the same thing. My first reaction was to see if I had fractured any bones, that silence, I don't need to move for that. I just silenced him and felt his body, felt a lot of pain in his chest but I saw that it was nothing so serious that he breathed relatively well and could walk. Fingers, whole hands and feet, few grated, the driver's door wouldn't open. Too much.

Smoke from my car, and I believe from Sprinter too, was present in both cars. I was able to open the passenger door on the right side of the car, and then I went out and saw the Sprinter driver. Since he was wearing a belt, and Sprinter is a lot taller than the goal, he was fine with me getting hurt. Those who know the road to the cafes know that there is no one there, only farms away from the road. I called my dad before anyone got here. As soon as my father answered the phone I said, 'Father, I'm going to say something bad but seriously I need you to stay calm'. I didn't have to say anything else, my father understood and returned to me: 'okay son, you can talk calmly...'. Dad I crashed the car, I'm fine nothing happened to me 'I didn't even know'. I explained where I was, it wasn't far. Five minutes after the call, my dad was there with the car, super calm, and he didn't charge me with any details. I just said I needed to go to the doctor because it was hurting, I know pain, much more than I'd like and I knew that was not a common pain of common injuries. We went to the municipal hospital in Itupeva, the service was always top, I already needed some 4x of the PS de la and in the 4 were top, saved me without any mistake. I calmly explained what had just happened, then two PMs arrived in the ER confirming the accident. I stood on the gurney with the nurses cleaning up the wounds. Some grazed hands, knees, because I made the mistake of being without a seat belt in the car, a mistake I never made after that EQM. EQM is death for you don't know, there's a lot going on in a few seconds, you have a choice to come back. It's always a choice. On my neck with the crash on the steering wheel the doctors were reciprocating if I had not broken the lymph glandulae or some other vazo that compromises the immunologic system or respiratory system, I did several blood tests because the blow of the neck on the steering wheel had left a new mark, but this time thank God I didn't break anything, the sternocleidomastoid along with the scalenes held me back

The doctor told me that's what stopped worse fractures, because there's the detail I haven't told you. I had fractured four ribs on that beat. That I wouldn't know until three weeks later, because on the day, with the X-rays at the time of the accident, in the ER. Two doctors told me showing the X-rays that there were no fractures, that the pain I felt was just because of the beating, no belt, that sank the whole steering wheel into the panel of my Gol G4 2008. When I went to pick up the car all crumpled up at the patio in Itupeva, there was a meeting wrapped around me that still had broken ribs not knowing, they asked me aloud pointing their finger at me: 'Was that you in that car? And you're here all the time walking now getting your car? I swear they didn't believe it. The guy at the yard called his friends to show me and show me the car they probably talked about before. I stayed for two weeks, having trouble drying up after the shower, I got stuck and didn't want to ask for help I cried for about 20 minutes in the bathroom until I could dry up and go to bed. That same day I went back to the same doctor, who took new X-rays and identified four fractures, each in a different rib. One of the particular fractures showed a lot of God's care for me. She broke in the back, in the back, near the vertebra. With the impact of the accident, in theory I would displace one of the vertebrae, consisting of the ligament of the spine probably generating a permanent paralysis. But God's mercy is infinite, it caused my rib to fracture before the vertebra, the pain is much greater than a fracture in the front of the ribs. That's because the vertebra passes through all the veins and roots of the central nervous system was this fracture of the back that had caused that lock of mine after the bath, we concluded talking to the doctor later. Already recovered, I needed two months of bed to heal the pain in the ribs and prevent any

Unaligned recovery. I still have a memory in the nervous system that insists on reminding me. That at the point of the fracture, at the back of the rib, grows according to the doctor 'a fibrous callus' a thicker part of bone on the point of the fracture, is normal is part of the recovery, but since it is a point of the body very sensitive, it does not allow me to sit comfortably for a long time. Anyone who knows me knows I'm not in a chair for long, even if you're interested in the conversation. It is not mania or discomfort, it is because the support on the back presses the point of the fracture and I start to feel a tingling, that if I do not get up and feel the blood circulation in that region, it does not pass. 29 The extraction system was known as sky hook and made by a modified C 47 aircraft. The cables were nylon and had an elastic system to absorb the initial impact force. This system was applicable to people and loads. 30 Calm down when the solution comes... 31 For most of your life you believed belonging meant being accepted. It doesn't. Acceptance can be bought. And you figured that out early. You learned which parts of you received affection and which created tension. Be helpful and people smile. Always be available and people would remember you. Understand everyone and you will be called mature. Forgive me quickly and you will be considered a good person. But say no at the wrong time and suddenly the weather changes. You become difficult, cold, different, selfish. Nobody used those exact words, they didn't have to. You felt the change. Then he started to change before they did. This has become a hidden skill. You walked into an environment and quickly discovered which version of you could survive there. With one person you spoke less,

With another, he made more jokes, with another he had an almost infinite patience, with another he hid the size of his ambitions, with another he pretended that one thing had not hurt you. You didn't see it as abandoning yourself, you thought you were just avoiding trouble. And since each concession seemed small, you never saw the total cost. Nobody asked you to disappear at once. You've disappeared to pieces. That's why loneliness confused you so much. You could be surrounded by people and still feel them. Sometimes the loneliest version of you wasn't the one sitting alone at night. It was the one sitting next to the people she loved, carefully choosing every word before opening her mouth. It's a hard pain to explain, because looking out you weren't alone. There were a lot of names on your phone, people knew you, some really cared about you, but someone knowing who you are doesn't mean that that person really sees you, and someone needing you definitely doesn't mean that person knows you. That difference became important when the first relationship began to fall apart, after you stopped playing the usual role. That childhood friendship, a relationship, a family dynamic. The exact person doesn't matter, the important thing is how everything seemed common at that moment. Someone expected something from you, an immediate answer, one more favor, one more apology, one more ransom, one more chance, one more time when you would swallow what you were feeling so that nothing needed to change. Only this time you didn't. You didn't attack anyone, you didn't become cruel, you just refused to disappear. That shouldn't have been enough to destroy something real. Yet the connection changed almost immediately. For days, weeks actually; you blamed yourself, thought your limit had caused the removal. In a way it did, but not for the reason you imagined. The limit did not destroy the relationship. He revealed the version of that relationship that couldn't survive a limit. There's a difference and that was the first clue. After that you began to perceive the same pattern elsewhere. Some people loved his goodness, but they had difficulty accepting his limits. Some loved to receive his attention, but they were troubled when that attention returned to their own lives. Some loved how much you could understand them, but they showed little curiosity in understanding you. And some really liked you, but they only knew how to relate to an old version of you. That last group was the hardest. Because not everyone who leaves is a bad person. Not everyone who can't keep up with your change is fake. Sometimes two people simply fail to fit into the roles that once kept that relationship working. You needed to learn this because the pain had taught you a much simpler story. If someone's leaving, someone needs to be guilty. And normally you chose yourself. That was his old equation: distance means rejection, rejection means defect. So if someone's leaving, there must be something wrong with me. You repeated that equation so many times that it stopped looking like a thought. It seemed like a truth. Then there came a time when several things disappeared almost together. That's why it hurt so much. An end can be explained. There's a lot of evidence coming up. A friend walked away, a plan went wrong, a relationship changed, a group stopped looking like his place, that opportunity disappeared. And suddenly there was silence everywhere. You looked around and thought, That can't be a coincidence. Maybe I really am the common point of all this. It was. But being the common point didn't mean you were the problem. You were the one who was changing. That was the part you still couldn't see. The third clue appeared at a moment you almost missed.

You were alone, at home, also driving, walking in that place with no one at your side. And for a few minutes the silence didn't hurt. Nothing extraordinary happened. You just realized your body was quiet. No message to interpret, no other humor to administer, no fear that a wrong phrase could change someone's affection for you, no need to prove that he deserved someone to stay. You were alone and you were safe. That confused you because for a long time you treated loneliness as a proof of failure. But his body was trying to say something that his mind had not yet accepted. There are times when loneliness seems really good. That's when the isolation changed. Until then you only knew him as an absence. Now he's become contrast. For the first time you could compare what it was like to be alone with the feeling of abandoning yourself in the presence of other people. And for the first time being alone didn't automatically miss that comparison. You weren't learning you don't need anyone. I was learning that needing a connection doesn't mean accepting any price to have it. It's two completely different lessons. And when you understood that, the next phase began. You stopped chasing after all the absence. Before when someone was silent, his mind immediately filled the void: This person is angry, I did something, found someone better, doesn't care about me, I need to explain, I need to send another message, I need to figure this out before it disappears. The mind hates empty spaces. So you make up answers. And since your oldest fear was rejection, almost all the invented answers put you on the stand. Until one day someone walked away and you let the space remain empty. You didn't decide that that person hated you, you didn't decide that he was secretly against you, you didn't decide that you were impossible to love. And you didn't run after her either.

sentence. You waited. It seems little, to you it was huge, because the uncertainty had always been unbearable. One unanswered question could control your whole day. Now there was a little space between what someone else did and what you decided it meant about you. This space has become freedom. Not complete freedom, you still felt, you still missed people, you still wanted answers, but wanting an answer and needing it to stay you are different things. And that difference changed who had power over his peace. And this is where history changes. You thought you were alone because you had finally learned to leave. That was only half the story. Leaving was never your hardest lesson. Your hardest lesson will be to stay. Don't stay where you need to decrease. Stay when something healthy finally appears. Because after living unstable connections long enough, peace may seem suspicious. Someone respects your no and you start to wonder what that person really wants. Someone gives you space without turning silence into punishment and that seems strange. Someone likes you without demanding a performance and suddenly you don't even know what role you should play. Isolation wasn't preparing you to be superior, I wasn't hiding you from the whole world and I wasn't making sure some perfect version was about to appear. He was removing the noise long enough for you to answer questions whose answers he always left in the hands of others: what I really like, what I believe when no one is agreeing with me, what life I would build if I wasn't trying to make everyone understand it, what I tolerate just because I'm afraid of losing people, what I call love simply because I'm afraid to call family and perhaps the hardest: if nobody applauds the person I'm becoming I still want to become that person? Few ask themselves that question, it is really necessary. Your answer

Yes, it is. That's why ancient places started to lose power over you. You could miss me by not wanting to live there again. I could remember someone with affection without turning that memory into an argument to reopen a door. You could admit that a relationship had really beautiful moments and still accept that your current form was hurting you. That's maturity. Kids need stories about heroes and villains. Adults eventually discover that some endings occur between two human beings who carry wounds, limits, and reasons. You didn't have to turn everyone who left into a villain to make your decision valid. And you also didn't have to become the villain because you finally chose yourself. That was the fourth clue. But there was still an ancient belief hidden beneath everything. You believed that if enough people went away, at some point that pattern would prove something permanent about you. So life presented you with a strange test. It wasn't a person leaving anymore, it was a person getting in a different way. Hasn't someone ever punished your new version? He cut off the constant access of that church childhood friend, decided to test "maybe it's him" and it was. Someone in your family. Someone you didn't even expect. You said no. The person said all right. You disagreed. She didn't disappear. You needed space. She didn't turn it into a weapon. You told the truth. And the relationship survived the truth. A part of you barely knew how to react. Because a single healthy answer, as it translated years of expectation, it proved that the problem was never that you were impossible to know. The problem was the kind of belonging you had learned to recognize. You confused anxiety with depth, being necessary with being loved, constant access with proximity, intensity with intimacy. Afraid of losing someone as proof that that connection was important. When these definitions began to change, their circle

It could get smaller without your life becoming more empty. That difference matters. A smaller circle is not automatically a better circle. But quantity stopped serving as evidence. You didn't need ten people around anymore to prove you belonged somewhere. An honest connection could bring more peace than an entire room of relationships maintained through performance. And now I can finally answer that initial question of yours. So that's why you're always alone. Not because I'm destined to go through life without friends. Not because everyone is secretly afraid of you. Not because being chosen makes you incompatible with other human beings. And not because all the people who left were wrong. You spend this time alone because there was a phase where your old way of belonging stopped working before your new way of connecting was fully formed. There was a space between the two. A social desert. Your old version knew how to get acceptance. The new one refused to keep paying the same price. But this new version had not yet learned how to let someone approach without expecting that at some point it needed to disappear to keep that person. That break seemed like punishment. It was actually transition. And this is exactly where you were right all along. You were right when something inside you said, That shouldn't cost me that much. You were right when a room full of people still seemed empty. You were right when you realized that being understood by everyone was less important than stopping betraying what you already understood about yourself. You were right when you realized that some connections only continued to exist because you carried both sides. You were right to see the pattern. I was only wrong when you concluded that pattern meant no one could love you. It never meant that. It meant that his definition of belonging needed to change. There's a huge difference. Because if

You believe you don't deserve to be loved, the solution seems to be to change yourself until someone stays. But if you understand that your belonging model was broken, the solution is to change what you call a connection. That's what you've been doing. Gradually. In an imperfect way. Sometimes wrong. You don't have to become inaccessible to feel safe. You need to become someone who can remain present without giving up the right to leave. It's different. A limit says, that's how you get in. And your strongest version is not the one that needs anyone. But the one who can finally say: I want you here, but I'm not gonna turn into someone else to make you stay with me. That phrase contains love and respect. For a long time you believed you had to choose only one. That was the trap. That's why some environments tire you out much faster today. It doesn't necessarily mean people there are bad. You're just less willing to split into acceptable pieces. And when you stop splitting up, less places will do. At first. That part matters. At first. Don't turn a transition phase into a prophecy. Don't say: I'm the one who's always alone. Words like that have also seen places. And you might end up trapped inside them. You're not the amount of people around you today. It's not the number of messages on your phone. It's not the relationship that ended. It's not friendship that's changed. It's not the environment that couldn't recognize you. You're a person learning a more honest way to belong. And true belonging takes longer because it cannot be manufactured through performance. That's why you can't run to the next connection just to prove that the old loneliness is over. Let it be real. Let people gradually reveal themselves. And let you also reveal yourself to the right extent. Observe consistency. Observe reciprocity. Observe if words and attitudes eventually meet. Watch if

You feel more like yourself after being with someone and not less. And when something good comes, don't make that person pay for what someone else did. Perhaps this is the most difficult instruction of all this message. The person before you should not be judged for the crimes of all the people who came before her. Discernment. Look at the evidence. Fear decides the sentence first. You're learning the difference. And she's separated two things that you've confused for most of your life: being alone and being abandoned. You can be alone without abandoning yourself and can be surrounded by people while abandoning yourself every day. When you understood that, the mystery ended. Silence was never proof that no one wanted you. It was the first place you stopped negotiating against yourself just so you didn't have to listen to it. That's why it seemed so harsh. That's why it lasted longer than you thought. And that's why when you finally look back, some of the doors you begged to open up again will make more sense closed. Not all of them. Life isn't that organized. There will be losses that you still wish had ended otherwise. People you still miss. Questions that may never receive satisfying answers. But you don't need every ending to be justified before you go on living. You can carry love without carrying access. You can carry memories without obligation. You can carry grief without turning it into a sentence. This is the person the prophecy was revealing. Not someone who doesn't belong anywhere. Someone who understands that belonging should never require identity. 32 God is top. Let Zépin think he's winning until he's 40. After that, it totally takes away the little control he thought he had. At once.

33 God kept a gun he never had to use. Not because it was too dangerous for the enemy, but because it was too dangerous for anyone who carried it. For generations, names were placed before her: kings, warriors, prophets, people who survived what should have destroyed them. All names were rejected until yours came up. The seal opened and, beside his name, there was only one instruction: do not teach him how to use it. There was only one problem: no one had taught. You had already used it, and when the sky searched your life for the moment it happened, you found no battle, no miracle, no enemy falling before you. You found an ordinary place, a message, a choice you made when no one was looking, and something that's been going through people for years has stopped at you. Stay with me, because before this is over you will understand why the most dangerous weapon in heaven was never created to destroy a person. The first record was old. The gun had no blade, no handle, no shape on which two people could agree. A testimony said it looked like a sword. Another said it looked like a door closing. Another said there was absolutely nothing to see. Only one sentence written below the seal: What gets into whoever carries it doesn't have to come out through it. For centuries, no one understood the meaning. Then the tests began. First they chose the strongest, a warrior capable of enduring pain without breaking. He failed. Then a ruler capable of commanding thousands without hesitation. Missed. So they chose a man known to forgive everyone who hurt him. He failed even faster. That didn't make sense. If the weapon belonged to God, shouldn't the man who forgave the most be just the safest to carry it? The record didn't explain. He just revealed another warning: Mercy without limit becomes permission. So they chose someone ruthless. It failed, too. Then someone disciplined, someone brilliant, someone who never

He raised his voice, someone who had spent his whole life helping others. Rejected. There was no apparent pattern until his name opened the seal. They started looking for what made you different. At first, they assumed it needed to be something impressive: a moment when you defeated someone, a situation that should have destroyed you, but failed, the moment when you finally became strong enough to never be hurt again. But the gun hadn't woken up at any of those times. It was activated later. Someone hurt you. Not in a cinematic way, that common human form that sometimes hurts even more because no one around can see the damage. They lied. They used something against you that you trusted that person with. They made you question yourself. They disappeared when you needed them most. They came back when they needed something for the plan to go on. KKKKKK Sometimes you thought, 'Man, for him not to see this, he has to be very dominated by someone he doesn't even trust.' His heart felt sorry, even though he knew all the words were false. He saw and prayed for mercy. The details changed. What mattered happened afterwards. For the first time, the advantage was in your hands. You knew things you could use, you knew words that could hurt, you had the opportunity to expose that person, to make her experience the same uncertainty that she had put inside you. And for a moment, you did. It matters. The record didn't pretend you were pure. He showed the anger, the message you almost sent, the whole discussion that happened inside your head, the part of you that thought: now it's your turn to feel. Then something happened. You stopped. Not because what you did was acceptable, not because suddenly you started to love that person, much less because you were afraid. You looked at what had come into you and decided you wouldn't go out the same way. The gun woke up. No thunder. No light. No one around you noticed. But the

Registration changed. One sentence appeared below your name: Transmission aborted. That was the first clue. The weapon had never been created to destroy whoever hurt you. She had been created to destroy what she was trying to continue through you. So they went back to the old candidates and finally the pattern came up. The warrior could bear pain, but each wound made him more willing to hurt someone weaker. The ruler knew how to control an entire kingdom, but because he knew impotence, he needed everyone around him to feel the power he now possessed. The man who forgave everything seemed holy on the outside, but never ended anything, called any limit of cruelty, allowed the same damage to return countless times, until innocent people around him began to pay the price of what he refused to face. The ruthless candidate interrupted violence by becoming even better at it. Different people. Same failure. Everything that entered them found some way to continue. Fear became control. Humiliation turned into humiliation. Abandonment turned to abandon first. Betrayal became distrust. Impotence became domination. The pain changed, but it survived. A new description was written: it does not destroy the origin. Then another line appeared: it destroys the inheritance. That should explain everything. He did not explain, because when they looked at your life more closely, they found moments when you reacted, moments when you expelled people from your life, moments when you raised your voice, moments when you could not forgive quickly. If the gun was meant to keep the pain from continuing, why hadn't those moments disqualified you? The record was opened again. The answer immediately appeared: No violence is not a weapon. They tried another interpretation: Sorry is not a weapon. Other: Silence is not a weapon. So what was it? They separated three moments from your life. First, someone crossed a line and you left. In the second, someone crossed a line and you remained time

Enough to fix what could still be fixed. In the third, it was you who crossed the line and instead of defending yourself, you admitted it. Three completely different attitudes. Same result. The old pattern didn't decide what would happen next. That was the gun. Not a behavior, a capacity: the ability to decide what goes through you and what ends in you. For the first time, the old warning made sense: what enters into who carries it does not need to come out through it. Pain can enter without becoming cruel. Power can enter without becoming domination. Fear can enter without becoming control. Love can enter without becoming possession. Anger can enter without becoming destruction and even forgiveness can enter without becoming permission. The gun didn't make you harmless. She has made you responsible for what she transmits ahead. That difference was everything. This is where they found out why the sky had hidden that weapon. The danger wasn't someone evil to steal it. The danger was someone wounded to understand his purpose the wrong way. So they created one last test. They put three doors in front of who would carry the gun. Behind the first was the person who had most injured that person. Behind the second was someone innocent who defended her. Behind the third, a mirror. The instruction was simple: use the gun. The first candidate opened the first door, saw his enemy and attacked. Rejected. The second candidate refused to open any door, called isolation peace. Rejected. The third opened the mirror door and blamed himself for absolutely everything that had happened in his life. Rejected. So the record faked you. You opened the first door, didn't attack, but you didn't invite that person back in either. You closed the door, opened the second one, found someone innocent carrying consequences that should never belong to that person. You stayed. So it opened the third, the mirror, and it was here that, for a few moments, the record failed to classify its reaction. You didn't love what you saw, but you didn't hate it either. Looked at time enough to separate two things that most people spend their lives confusing: what they did to you and what you became responsible for afterwards. A new phrase appeared: accepted carrier. They finally understood why force was not enough, why goodness was not enough, why forgiveness was not enough, why aggression was not enough. Weapons required something more difficult than all of them: discernment, the ability to say: this pain is real, but it does not choose my character; this anger is real, but it does not receive unlimited authority; this person was important to me, but that does not mean that he will have permanent access to my life; I made a mistake, but shame will not turn a mistake into an identity; I was treated unjustly, but having suffered injustice does not automatically justify anything I do after. It is precisely there that most currents survive: not in the original wound, but in the permission that the wound then receives. So they started tracking these currents through generations. A father had been controlled as a child; years later, he called it protection control. A mother had been abandoned; years later, she held people so strong that love began to seem afraid. Someone grew up being ridiculed for looking weak; years later, he ridiculed any sign of weakness in others. Someone grew up without ever being heard; years later, when he finally gained authority, he stopped listening. None of these people woke up in the morning deciding to continue what one day hurt them. That's exactly what made everything so dangerous. The broadcast rarely announces its arrival. She disguises herself as personality, pattern, profession, sincerity, strength, sometimes even love. The gun would rip off the cover. That's why she could never be handed over to someone desperate to own a gun. Anyone who was obsessed with destroying an enemy would point to the wrong target. The target was never the person before you. The target was the pattern looking for another body, another relationship, another generation, another place I could survive. And then they noticed something disturbing in their record. You had used the gun more than once, long before you knew it existed. They found a moment when someone underestimated you. For years, you wanted to prove that person wrong, until you realized that your life had quietly begun to be built for an audience that you weren't even watching anymore. You stopped building for revenge. Transmission aborted. They found another moment. You had been excluded. For a while, he began to expect rejection even before a connection could exist, until he met someone new and realized that he was preparing to punish that person for something he had never done. You stopped. Transmission aborted. So they found a moment when you finally got the power. The old fantasy said that being able would mean making everyone who doubted you regret it, but when the opportunity came, you discovered something strange. I didn't want your future to continue working emotionally for your past. Transmission aborted. The same thing happened every time. Something came to you, you felt, you didn't pretend to exist, but it changed what would come out of you. The record began to fill with interruptions, dozens of them, some huge, others so small that no one would ever notice. A message you didn't send, an insult you didn't return, a limit you finally put, an apology you finally made, a person who stopped trying to save, a person who stopped blaming for a decision that at some point became yours. That's when they found the price. Each interruption required you to lose something: sometimes the satisfaction of revenge, sometimes the fantasy that someday someone would come back to fix everything that had broken, sometimes the identity of being forever the innocent person of history, sometimes the access to someone you still loved, sometimes the comfort of saying ?I am like this? even?. That's why the gun was so hard to carry. She didn't just cut off the chains connected to other people; she also cut off the excuses that kept these chains alive within those who carried her. A new warning came up: the gun cuts in both directions. Now the seal made sense. Don't teach him how to use it. Not because knowledge was forbidden, but because by the time someone turned that into a technique to feel superior to others, the weapon would have fallen from their hands. You can't use it thinking: I'm more evolved than anyone who hurt me. That's just the old chain wearing spiritual clothes. You can't use it to escape all difficult conversation. That's fear dressed in peace. You can't justify cruelty by simply calling cruelty a limit. That's pain learning a better vocabulary. And you also cannot accept everything while calling yourself compassionate. That's abandoning yourself using a halo. The gun only works when you can see what's really going on without having to be the hero of all the stories. That's why the mirror was part of the test. The ultimate weapon could not belong to someone capable of seeing darkness only in others. It would need to belong to someone willing to recognize what the darkness also tried to build inside it and then choose what would happen next. They're back on the oldest record. There was a part no one had ever been able to open. Now the seal has answered your name. Inside there was only one question: what was God's supreme weapon created to destroy? They waited for the obvious answers: evil, hatred, the enemy, darkness. None of them showed up. Instead, the record wrote: continuation without conscious choice. Then a second sentence appeared: what must end does not need another host. That was the whole project: not making you invulnerable, not preventing the pain from reaching you again, not turning you into someone who never feels anger, never fails, never

You have to set limits and never hurt anyone. The weapon had been created for a much more humane battlefield: the instant after something reaches you, those few seconds when pain asks to turn into behavior, when fear asks to become control, in which humiliation asks to become revenge, in which rejection asks to become rejection of itself, in which power asks to become domination, in which a wound asks permission to write the next chapter. That's where the gun exists, in that space where you can say: you've come to me, but you won't cross my body in the same way. And now the title begins to mean something else. You carry God's supreme weapon. You may have imagined a sword capable of defeating anyone who stood up against you, but the most dangerous weapon in this story has never been pointed out. It was the ability to end what would otherwise continue to reproduce through human lives. And that explains why some of the greatest victories of your life never seemed to win. No one applauded when you decided not to send that message. No one saw the moment he decided not to become cruel simply because he finally had reason to be. Nobody gave you a medal when you set a line without having to hate it. No one celebrated when you admitted you were wrong instead of protecting your own ego. No one knew how close an old pattern came to getting another life through you, but the record knew. Transmission aborted. 34 The sovereign soul refuses to be programmed. Then came the key. She opened a single door. Behind her was the life you could have lived if nothing painful had happened. No betrayal. No rejection. No failure. No loneliness. A life where you would never need to rebuild because you would never have been hurt. For the first time you hesitated, because that was not temptation through pain. It was temptation through innocence. You put the key in the lock and you stopped. Not because suffering is beautiful, nor because scars make someone special, but the person before that door no longer existed separated from all that he learned after. Erase all the wound would also erase answers that you were proud to have chosen today. So you took the key and said, I don't need the pain back, but I'm not gonna erase whoever learned after her. The door's gone. Death took a step to Get back. The iron rod went through the rest of the room and fell into his hands. Not in your head. On your hands. That mattered. All the others had tried to dress immediately. Not you. He's turned the scepter. There was a phrase on the inside. A hidden phrase just from those who wanted it too much. Whoever desires power over death is not yet ready to hold him. Down below, anyone who can let die without becoming a death can choose. Now the title begins to change. You didn't take the scepter of death because you defeated death. You received it because you stopped treating every finale as proof of failure. You could let an old version die without hating it. Closing accesses without turning every good memory into a lie. To abandon a dream without calling the years lived waste. To grieve without making it a permanent address. The iron rod recognized one thing that no power can fabricate: discernment. Knowing what needs to end and what deserves to be done with you. But the test wasn't over yet. Death reached out. Give it back. You gave it back. Same time. The angels protested. They thought you refused the choice. Death asked why. You answered: If I need to keep this to remain who I am, then that's what owns me. All the books in the House are open. Thousands of names. Thousands of finals. And the same phrase appeared on every page: it released power without losing authority. That never happened. All the previous chosen ones wanted to remain chosen. That was the trap. Being selected became another identity that could not die. Another throne to protect. Another role nobody wanted to give up. You did exactly what the scepter itself existed to test. You even let the idea of being chosen end. Death laughed. Not with cruelty, almost with relief. So you put the crown over your head and the room changed. You started seeing endings. Not the future. Finals. A friendship continuing after respect has ended. Someone still punishing themselves when everyone else has. A life built to prove something that wasn't even there anymore. An apology stuck in pride. A talent buried because a humiliation became prophecy. Someone calling it loyalty exhaustion. Someone else calling peace apathy. Another one calling it fear of intuition. That's when you understood the danger of the scepter. She makes it visible. But seeing an end doesn't make it easy to accept. Every ending requires some kind of funeral. Sometimes not by someone. For an expectation. An identity. The fantasy that someone will finally become the person you needed. The belief that if you explain perfectly, everyone will understand. The success version created only to be seen by those who once ignored you. The iron rod didn't kill those things. She showed when keeping them alive was costing more life than letting them finish. That's why so many people confuse continuation with hope. Some continuations are just afraid of grieving. The iron rod showed the difference. And for a few seconds that scared you. Because once you recognize an ending, it's hard to pretend you're not seeing the price. You can still stay, try, forgive. But now these decisions need to be conscious. The iron rod didn't tell you to abandon everything that was difficult. I'd do something worse: I'd take the excuse out of automatic continuity. From there it was a choice. Leave too. Try again too. Even hope needed to come from you, not the fear of accepting a loss. That was the real weight of the iron scepter: not deciding what dies. Decide what's still worth getting your life. Then death made the last request: choose something to finish. The House has filled itself with possibilities: enemies, regrets, mistakes, old versions of you. Angels hoped you'd pick someone. You chose a phrase. A phrase repeated for so long it already seemed true. Maybe: people always leave. Or: I need to do everything myself. Or if I stop proving myself, I'll disappear. Words could change. A structure was the same. An ancient experience passing itself as a permanent law. You pointed. Death asked: this? You answered: this has lived long enough. The sickle got heavy. Not because belief wanted to survive. Because a part of you wanted it. That belief had already protected you. If everyone leaves, you never get caught by surprise. If no one helps, you don't have to risk depending. If you have to prove yourself, you never find out who you are when nobody looks. Old beliefs don't survive just because they hurt. Sometimes they survive because at some point they helped. That's why releasing them may seem like treason. So you didn't insult the version of yourself that needed that belief. He said, "You can rest now." The phrase is gone. The sickle lost its weight. Death lowered its head and a final classification emerged: it does not seek power over the finals. seeking freedom from what continues without needing to continue. That's why they never picked someone like you. Others wanted power over death. You wanted to stop carrying what you had already finished. And there's a very different life after that. You stop taking expired identities to new places. Stop charging people for old new debts. Stop keeping goals alive just because one day you announced them. Stop treating every ending like a waste. Sometimes an end is not destruction. It's space. Space for another answer, another relationship, another version of you, another future that could not enter because the old one still occupied the door. That is the meaning hidden in the iron rod of death. She doesn't give permission to destroy. She gives responsibility for what you insist on keeping alive. And now they've never chosen someone like you either. Angels had seen people choose revenge, power, immortality, the past, another chance to force someone to love them in the right way. What they had almost never seen was someone receiving authority and using it first on their own attachment to authority. That's why you could wear the crown. Because I knew how to get it out too.

38 approved 39 Hold the new lead... 40. The sky heard a sound that had not heard for centuries: the beating of a wing. Just one. Then another one. The gates opened and an angel who had been recorded for ages as permanently unable to fly with two wings, entered again into heaven with both. Nobody moved. Nobody said a word. Because the second wing didn't look like the first. One had been made in heaven. The other carried dust, rain, blood, the corridor of a hospital, a locked room, a message that was never sent and the name of the person that angel had received the mission to protect. Then God looked at the restored wing, raised the two eyebrows with the air of is now and said only one word: "Impossible". Then he asked the angel a question that silenced the whole place: Who gave this to you? The angel bowed his eyes to the new feathers and answered: The person I was sent to save. This is where our story begins. Not with an angel delivering something to you, but with a moment when the sky discovered that somehow you had returned something, that some part of you always felt that the hardest things that survived should turn into something bigger than scars. The angel didn't always have one wing. Long before you were born, he had two and had a single mission: not to make your life easy, not to remove all the consequences, not to stop people from leaving. The mission was much more specific: it could only interfere when an event was about to become an identity. There's a difference: pain can happen to you without becoming your name. Rejection can happen without turning into me.

I'm wanted. Failure can happen without turning into me. A betrayal can happen without turning into anyone is trustworthy. It was in that little space that his work began, the instant after the event, before it became a definition of who you were. And for years he did it quietly: a delay, a call coming at the right time, a phrase that prevented a bad phase from turning into a permanent sentence, nothing dramatic enough to serve as evidence, just interruptions, enough to prevent a single moment from becoming his whole future, until there was a night when the mission changed. You had reached a point on which the angel had already been warned, not because your life was physically in danger, but because you were tired in a much more dangerous way: tired of needing to rebuild after the same places, tired of finding meaning in the things other people broke. And this time the old interventions would not be enough. The angel was given a choice: to remain within the mission rules or to overcome them. He's over it. He used one of his wings to protect a part of you that had already begun to close. Not your heart, something more specific: your willingness to become different from what happened to you. The wing burned, but not on fire. She simply disappeared from his body, as if that act had consumed something that could never be restored. You woke up the next morning knowing nothing, still tired, still angry, still living the same life. No miracle had fixed the room, no enemy had apologized, no answer had come, but a decision within you had survived that night. You weren't finished yet. The angel did, at least that's what heaven believed. An angel with a single wing could still serve, but could no longer go down the same way, could no longer reach those places where the

Human choices were still on the move. His mission with you has been terminated. The record said: Protection complete. Wing consumed. Impossible restoration. And for a long time that was true, until the first sentence appeared. It happened years later. The angel was standing on the edge of a place that was no longer allowed to leave when something fell to the ground beside him: a single feather. It was not white, it was not golden, it seemed almost unfinished: half light, half shadow. There was something written throughout her: a date of her life. The angel immediately recognized it. It was the day that someone appeared before you carrying exactly the kind of pain that one day you needed to carry alone. You were tired. No one would have blamed you for saying: today I can't. But something about that person caught your eye, the same look you had while you were waiting for a single person to realize you weren't well. So you stayed, not forever, not as a savior, just enough. You heard me, you said what you once wished someone had told you, then you came home and kept living your life. The feather appeared in heaven. The angel caught her and the moment he touched her, a line arose in the place where her wing used to exist, the beginning of a new wing. The sky opened an investigation. The first hypothesis was simple: the penalty had been returned by mistake, perhaps belonged to another angel. But when the oldest guardian examined that, he said: That feather wasn't done here. And that answer created a problem: everything that was angelic should originate in heaven. Human beings could receive, they could answer, they could refuse, but human beings did not produce what angels were made of. Then the sky began to observe you, not to judge, to understand what had happened, hoping you would repeat your behavior. And you repeated it, but no second sentence came up. You helped someone else, nothing. Forgave someone: nothing. Now the mystery was even greater. According to her had created that penalty, because second

It didn't work again. The angel asked to review the memory, opened the record, this time slowly. And he realized something that everyone else had ignored: the important moment didn't happen when you helped that person, it happened three seconds earlier. An ancient pain had arisen within you and a thought crossed your mind: No one did that for me. For a moment you almost let that phrase decide what would happen next. No one did that for me. Then why should I do it for someone else? It would be understandable, perhaps even seem fair, but you looked at the person before you and made a decision that had nothing to do with justice. You've decided: then you start here. A second sentence appeared in heaven. The penalty was created at the point of reversal. That was the first true answer. You had taken something that entered your life in the form of absence and refused to transmit that absence to someone else. One day the angel had spent a wing to prevent an event from becoming his identity. Years later, you'd done something like that for someone else, not because an angel made you, because you chose. The wing wasn't being returned, it was being recreated. And that difference frightened the sky, because if it could be recreated, it meant that the original intervention had become something independent. So they decided to test the theory, opened another memory: someone had lied to you. This time you confronted that person. No pity: another memory. Someone humiliated you in front of other people. You decided not to avoid anything. Another: you forgave someone who never apologized: nothing. The angels began to think that the first penalty had been an accident, until it arrived at a time no one considered important: you had hurt someone, not on purpose, but intention, a vague consequence. You could see the damage and your first impulse was known: explain, defend yourself, say what you really meant, prove that you

He wasn't the person they were imagining. You almost did it. So you stopped, you listened, you apologized without forcing that person to analyze you, and when she didn't forgive you immediately, you allowed that, too. A second feather appeared, the sky was silent again. Now they understood: the wing was not being built with kindness; kindness can become performance; it was not being built with suffering; suffering can become cruelty; it was not built with forgiveness; forgiveness can become abandonment of itself. The feathers appeared when an old pattern tried to take control and you refused to allow him to make the next decision. The angel looked at both feathers and said: He's doing it without me. That should have ended the mission. Instead, it became the beginning of something that had never been recorded. It's made you recognize things that you've been carrying for years and that never really belonged to you, it's focused on me, because the third sentence wasn't born of kindness. She was born of anger and it changed everything the sky believed to have understood. There was someone you spent too much time with. For a long time, that fuel worked, made you keep going, made you spend nights where self-love didn't seem enough, but fuel and fate aren't the same thing. Until one morning, without any ceremony, you realized: I don't want my future to remain an answer to my past. You didn't forgive everyone, you didn't forget what happened, you just stopped demanding that an audience from yesterday watch what you'd build tomorrow. And the last sentence came up. She was different from all the others, she carried no memory, only one sentence: the gift no longer needs the one who delivered it. The angel was the first to understand. The whole wing had been built with moments when what you needed to do one day became something you could consciously do for yourself and, when necessary, for other people. But the last penalty

It could only appear when not even the angel himself was needed anymore. That was the paradox: he had lost a wing to prevent you from being trapped within a single version of yourself, only managed to recover it when you no longer needed him to do so. The gates opened, he entered: two wings, one created in heaven, another built within a human life that had learned what to do with what he received. And that brings us back to the first moment. The whole sky was silent. God looked at the wing, then looked at the angel: who gave it to you? The person I was sent to save. And God said: Impossible. Not as an insult, not because he doubted what was before him, but because there was an ancient law written in the very structure of that mission: angels deliver, humans receive. The wing before him proved that the law was incomplete. You had received help, then transformed that and finally returned something that once did not exist: not the same wing, a new one. That's why heaven called you impossible, you had reversed the direction of the present. The angel was sent to preserve his ability to choose. You used that ability to create something that even he couldn't create alone: meaning. Because help can sustain someone for one night, advice can show a door, protection can stop a fall, but none of these things can finish the job. At some point, what was given to you needs to become a choice that you can make without the person who delivered it. Otherwise, protection becomes dependence, guidance becomes obedience, love becomes permission to never grow. The biggest proof that someone really helped you is not needing that person forever, is to come to the moment when something she needed to carry for you turns into something that you can carry without her and sometimes something that you can carry for someone else: not forever, not emptying out, not emptying out.

turning into everyone's savior. That would just create another broken wing. That's why the angel's restoration didn't happen when you sacrificed your life for others. It happened when you learned when to stay, when to leave, when to apologize, when to refuse, when to receive, when to stop proving. Different attitudes, same origin. You were becoming able to participate in your own rescue. That's the part that hardly anyone tells about being saved. At first, salvation feels like a hand coming down to you. Later, when it really works, it starts to look like its own hand making a decision that no one can make in its place. The angel didn't fail when you stopped needing him. That was the completion of the mission. And now the title begins to mean something else: you gave an angel your last wing, not because you found a feather hidden somewhere on Earth, not because you secretly possessed more power than heaven. You delivered the last thing that that angel's sacrifice needed to finally have meaning: a life that did not waste what he received. That's what completed the wing. And the last penalty, she didn't come when you helped someone, didn't come when you forgave her, didn't show up when you won. She was born when her future ceased to be an argument with her past. That's why I didn't carry any memories. She represented the first part of you, which no longer needed to be explained by what happened before. Part of you were trying to separate your true identity from ancient fears, inherited patterns and roles you learned to play for other people but now your being is truly free. 41 Some people still believe they can hide something from me. I know everything already.

42 Every day a different ball! Once, about three months ago, my black kitten was lost five days in the street without coming home, I never cried so much in my life. I looked hard enough for her when she came back, skinny, scared. After that, no more pain bends me. 44 @lippy.of 45 So he set up the meeting. First, a messenger appeared with a vague invitation, no explanation, no promise. You almost ignored it, but you ended up leaving and for the first time you saw that man surrounded by everything that was previously absent. The room itself revealed who he was before anyone said a word: security guards, symbols, people waiting for his permission. So you recognized the face. That man, that day. The heir observed his reaction. I was hoping for embarrassment, maybe a sudden upbringing, maybe you'd try to remember if you said something stupid. But something else came up: concern. You asked a question that no one in that room expected: 'Are you all right now?'. No What do I get? Why didn't you tell me? Don't you even remember what I did for you? So did you hear you're okay now? The heir looked around. Had the king not spent months celebrating his return? Very few people had asked what getting lost had done to him. In that instant he understood why his face had remained in memory. You met him before the title and even after you discovered the title you kept looking for the person. But it wasn't over yet. Because power also creates temptation in those who approach it. The heir has offered a reward, a huge reward. You hesitated, and it matters. You didn't stage a false purity saying immediately that you didn't

I didn't want anything. Money is useful, opportunities matter. You knew that. Then he asked: Why? He said: Because you saved my life. You disagreed, you said you'd barely done anything. He insisted. So you answered something that silenced the room: If you need to pay me, then it wasn't nice. It was a loan I didn't even know I was making. The heir had never heard anyone talk to him like that. Not because refusing reward is automatically noble, but because you were protecting the meaning of an action even after discovering that it had become valuable. He refused to rewrite his own past for profit. That moment happened when you believed no one important was present. You wanted it to remain true. Then he asked for something else: if he really believed that that day had saved something inside him, he should do for someone else what you had done without realizing: finding someone without status, without access, without evident usefulness and remembering that the dignity of that person existed before discovering who he could become. The heir accepted. He later tried to do it and found another trap. By helping someone, he immediately felt proud to be the generous heir. You were still putting yourself in the center. When you admitted that, you asked, did that person need you to feel humble or need what you did? He understood: doing something good was no longer a title to wear. The other person was the center. And now we can understand the phrase: he had never seen anyone like you. Not literally. He met generous, courageous, loyal people, people who sacrificed far more than you. What I had never found was that combination at the very moment I needed it: someone capable of treating a person as valuable before knowing what value the world attributed to him and then refusing to change the meaning of the gesture by discovering who that person was. That's much rarer. Because everyone is affected by context. They change near who can us

Reward. They become more careful before authority, more attentive to beauty, more patients in the face of status. It doesn't turn them into monsters, it makes them human. But leave a question: who gets their best version? Only who can open doors? Who has the approval you want? Who impresses you? Or does part of his character continue to exist in places where no one can reward him? That's the real test. Not if you would recognize a lost heir: you probably wouldn't recognize it. The question is another. Should anyone need to be heir to his dignity to become visible? He wasn't just someone important disguised as someone unimportant. It represented every person whose visible condition tells only part of the story. Including you. The world finds someone in the middle of a sentence and believes they've read the whole book. Temporary conditions have seen permanent sentences. You don't know who each person will become and you don't need to know. Treating someone with dignity should not require a secret prophecy revealing that that person belongs to royalty. If the unknown only deserves respect because then we discover a crown, we completely lose sense. The crown makes the lesson visible. It doesn't create the value of a person. Near the end, the heir reread the report on you. On the last line someone had written: The person doesn't seem to know the identity of the heir. He scratched and wrote below: That's exactly why I trust the evidence. What revealed you was what you did before you knew that one day it could become history. No camera, no reward, no powerful witness, just one person in front of you and a decision on how to treat you. 46 That's the game. And for a player within the game it matters a lot. He arranges the board until a certain reaction seems irresistible. Then you'll be waiting. If you want your anger, it doesn't tell you to be angry. He gives you an injustice. If you want your desperation, don't send

beg. It offers silence just when you need an answer most. If you want to abandon yourself, it makes it look like that's the price you need to keep from losing something important. That's how the game works. The pieces move themselves. And for years you've been very good at surviving this. Maybe too good. He learned to perceive tones, pauses, sudden changes in subject matter, the difference between confusion and purposeful ambiguity. He learned when caring was used as currency, when guilt appeared disguised as responsibility, when an apology meant only: forget everything without requiring change. You've become hard to surprise. But being hard to surprise doesn't mean being free. The player realized that before you. So you changed your strategy. He stopped hiding the traps, let you see them. Because when a wounded person begins to feel proud to identify all dangers, a new trap appears: distrust. Now he didn't have to make you trust the wrong person. All I had to do was make you trust no one. You didn't have to destroy your limits. Just turn them all into walls. I didn't have to make you naive. It could make your judgment so exhausted that any uncertainty would begin to seem evidence. And that's when the board got dangerous. Because some threats were real. Some people actually lied. Some situations really required distance. His perception was not imaginary. The trap was another one. The player wanted to turn every correct observation into a permanent rule. A betrayal turns: no one is reliable. A rejection turns: never need anyone. A humiliation turns: attack first. A period being ignored turns: make everyone regret not having valued you. The pain of emotional authority the rule, then you begin to call the rule of wisdom. The first eye almost opened when you realized that. Almost. But it remained closed, because you still believed the solution was to create better rules. So you stayed

Never react first, never show too much, never let anyone find out where it might hurt you. For a while it worked. The player lost several easy moves, but something else disappeared together: spontaneity, warmth, curiosity, the ability to enter a new place without forcing everyone there to answer for what happened in ancient places. You were protected, but not completely alive. Then came the match that changed everything. And she didn't start with an enemy. It started with someone you liked. That mattered. The player needed something to lose. A message has arrived. Short, ambiguous, those that can mean five different things depending on which wound you read first. Your mind started working: you're moving away, you're hiding something, you're disrespecting you, you want to run behind, you don't do that. The board came up. On the one hand: confronting, demanding an answer now. On the other, disappear before they can reject you. Two moves. They both looked strong. They were both familiar. And they were both ready. You took a piece, then you stopped. Not because you discovered the meaning of the message. You didn't know yet. And that was the news. For the first time, uncertainty remained only uncertainty. You looked at the board and asked, why are these the only two moves? The first eye opened. The player's smile is gone. You put the play back, you didn't attack, you didn't disappear. He waited until his body stopped turning fear into certainty. Then he asked a direct question, no charge hidden, no punishment, no indifference, just clarity. The answer came, and it was common. The message did not mean what his wound had predicted. Nothing dramatic happened. And that's why the moment mattered. You interrupted a pattern without needing the universe to reward you with a spectacular revelation. But only one eye was open. The second one was still closed. Because it's easy to stay calm when reality proves your fear wrong. The hardest test comes when your fear was right. And he came: another person, another situation, the same pressure. This time you realized something strange. It stopped. He asked instead of accusing. He watched instead of making it up. And the truth came out: did they lie to you? The player smiled again. That was his favorite position. When a wound gets evidence, it tries to use that truth to justify everything, see? You were right. I should have believed in the worst case scenario. Don't ever hesitate again. Don't ever make room again. Don't ever be fooled again. The board offered two new moves: pretend it didn't hurt and stay, or destroy the person before leaving. You both felt like it. Then he realized something: being right about lying did not make all his possible reactions right. The truth gave you information. He gave no authority limited to his pain. So you put a limit, without turning the limit into revenge. I told you what I knew. You didn't beg for a confession you didn't need anymore. You didn't use everything you knew as ammunition. He didn't just stay to prove how much he could stand. He came out of what he needed to finish and left without turning that person's behavior into instruction for the next one. The second eye opened. The player walked away from the board. That was the awakening. Not a supernatural vision that would put you above everyone else. The supreme eyes of God represent something much more difficult: seeing two truths at the same time without having to destroy one of them. You can have compassion and still recognize manipulation. You can understand someone's wound without offering to target them. You can admit that your fear distorted a situation yesterday and trust you when the evidence appears tomorrow. You can forgive without returning access. You can love someone and conclude that closeness is bad. You can feel anger without letting anger become a strategist. You may be wrong without concluding that your perception is worthless. Most traps depend on forcing one truth to kill another. If someone hurt you, then it's completely wrong. If anyone is hurt, you must tolerate everything. If

Nanny, you need to stay. If he did, he never did. If you were wrong once, stop trusting yourself. If you got it right once, trust every suspect. The player lives from false extremes. The eyes opened when you stopped accepting them. And suddenly the board looked different. You realized something almost ridiculous: there never was a rule saying that you were obliged to move a piece. The board only appeared so many times that participating began to seem mandatory. That's when the player started losing access to you. Not because nobody could manipulate you again. That would be fantasy. You're still human, you can still feel fear, loneliness, impatience. You can still misinterpret someone. The difference is that feeling something no longer automatically produces a move. Now there's a space between the board showing up and your hand touching the piece. And within that space you can see. Stay with me here now, because this is where history changes. The player still had a strategy. If you could not control your movements through pain, you would try to control through identity. He put a new piece on the board. It looked like a crown. In it was written: the one who sees everything. You liked that play, I know. Of course you did! After years of being confused, underestimated, taken by surprise or hearing that you were imagining things, the idea of finally being someone who could see through everyone seemed powerful. Then you took the crown and the two eyes began to close. That scared you. Why would more conscience make the supreme eyes close? So you understood: you had turned discernment into ego. Instead of seeing clearly, he began to need to be the one who could see better than anyone. Now any disagreement threatened his identity. Any mistake was hard to admit. Anyone who surprised you seemed like an offense to your intelligence. You had escaped from one board and started building another. So you put the crown back on. Her eyes opened. That was the move the player couldn't understand. You

He agreed to lose the identity of always being right to remain able to see what was true. There's a huge difference: whoever needs to be right is looking for evidence to defend a position. Anyone who wants to see clearly remains available for correction. One protects one's ego, the other protects perception. That's why in this story the eyes belong to God. Not because you literally activated something in heaven. History uses the maximum image of vision to represent a consciousness that refuses to serve the ego. Vision without need to dominate. Discernment without paranoia. Power without having to prove power all the time. And that produces a strange consequence: you become harder to control, just because you no longer need to control everything. The moves stop generating the same answers, not because you always do the opposite. Always doing the opposite is also predictable. You answer what's really going on, and it destroys the game. The player can prepare for rebellion, obedience, fear, pride. The hard part is getting ready for someone who doesn't have to support the same identity in every situation. Sometimes you confront, sometimes you leave, sometimes you forgive, sometimes you ask again, sometimes you admit you were wrong, sometimes you say no without anger, sometimes you say yes without fear. The answer changes because reality changes, its center doesn't. That's the hidden meaning of checkmate. It's not when all enemies are destroyed, it's when an old strategy runs out of useful moves. Think of the patterns that have already controlled you. If disrespect always produces anger, disrespect has a button. If distance always makes you chase, distance has a button. If criticism always destroys you, criticism has a button. If compliments always buy your agreement, the compliment has a button. If guilt always makes you abandon your limits, guilt has a button. The supreme eyes don't pull out those buttons. They allow you to see the hand trying to squeeze them. And seeing creates choice. This is where the title comes back to you. You woke your eyes

Supremes of God. In our language, you aroused the highest form of vision available on that board, when you stopped asking just what they're doing to me and started asking what it's trying to turn me into. That question changes everything. A provocation may be real, but what is she inviting you to become? A rejection might hurt, but what conclusion does she want you to draw on yourself? A betrayal may require an end, but why should a future relationship pay for a crime it did not commit? A compliment may be sincere, but are you about to exchange your judgment for the pleasure of being admired? Now you don't just observe people, you observe the relationship between events and their identity. This is a much bigger board. One day you look back and realize that something capable of controlling a whole week now only disturbs a few hours. Then something that controlled hours becomes a feeling that you can perceive without obeying. That's not emotional coldness, that's freedom increasing. The board slows down, your life grows. A chess match ended without any captured pieces. At first it seemed impossible, now you know why. Victory has never been hidden in a genius play. I was refusing to accept a board created by someone else as if it were the complete map of reality. That's why both eyes opened. One saw the outside. What happened? What was said? What evidence was there? What limit has been exceeded? What was real? The other saw the inside: what fear added, what pride wanted, what an old pain remembered, what identity felt threatened, what reaction was being prepared. One eye alone can fool. Just looking out can turn everyone into the problem. Looking inside alone can make you blame yourself for things that really require action. Together, they create discernment. This is the supreme vision: not knowing everything, but knowing how to look without immediately turning into what you are seeing. So when the player finally asked how you had won, you didn't say you were smarter. You didn't say you could predict every move. He just looked at the pieces and said, I finally realized I don't have to turn into a piece and there's nothing left for him to move. Checkmate. Not because you defeated all the people who tried to hurt you, but because that version of you, who could only react from old patterns, wasn't the only one available. You can still feel everything, just don't need to turn every feeling into an order. You can see darkness without loving it, you can see kindness without becoming naive, you can see your wounds without turning them into your name, you can see someone else's pain without believing you need to absorb it, you need to see a trap without spending the rest of your life looking for traps. The eyes are open, the board is visible and your hand still belongs to you. That was the part the player never planned. He prepared movements for your anger, your fear, your need for approval, your willingness to prove who you are, even for the pride of believing that no one else could manipulate you. What he couldn't predict was his ability to see all these parts without letting any of them become king. That's why the match ends here, not with destruction, with choice. The supreme eyes were never about seeing further than everyone else. It was about seeing clearly enough to choose what happens next. When you can do that, the old game runs out of place to continue. It's checkmate. 47 Discipline loses to people who have fun every time. 48 Perhaps the hardest part to accept was this: you had learned to explain so well the behavior of someone else that you no longer had to admit what that behavior was doing to you. Then he reacted: irritation, a strange desire to walk away, a harsh thought

Too much, a will to close the door. And as the reaction seemed ugly, you thought the reaction was the problem. That was the mistake. Their darkness did not always tell the truth, but often said: look here, there is a difference. Fear can misinterpret a situation; anger can exaggerate; jealousy can invent evidence; pain can make something innocent seem dangerous. So no, not every dark feeling is wisdom, but not every uncomfortable feeling is an enemy. An emotion is not always a verdict, it is an alarm. And an alarm doesn't need to understand the fire to know something's burning. You learned that slowly. The first clue came up in a relationship you insisted on fixing. It doesn't matter if it was love, family, friendship or something hard to define. It matters the pattern. Every time something hurt you, your light was trying to understand: maybe the person is stressed, maybe I didn't mean to, maybe I'm being overly sensitive, maybe I should explain myself better, maybe one more conversation will solve. His darkness had a much shorter vocabulary: enough. He seemed insensitive, primitive, almost cruel. So you ignored her. But every time she did, she got stronger: first the restlessness, then the irritation, the resentment, until she reached indifference. And there came a time when you barely recognized who was becoming close to someone you once desperately wanted to keep. I thought your darkness was destroying the relationship. Then came the first inversion: you finally created distance and your darkness remained silent. Not satisfied. Quietly. If she wanted destruction, why did she calm down when the conflict ended? Why did cruel thoughts lose power when you stopped forcing yourself to be available? Why did your body calm down when you stopped calling love failure every limit you set? That was the first clue: your darkness did not want to destroy that relationship; it wanted to return you to yourself. But you still didn't trust her. So life brought one

Second test. This time there was no villain. Someone good came into your life. Not perfect, not available all the time, just safe enough to show the difference. You expected the same alarms, and some came up. An answer took a long time and his mind prepared for abandonment. The tone changed and you started looking for what you'd done wrong. You argued and part of you waited for a punishment. The darkness was there again, but this time reality did not agree with it. The person answered later: nothing had happened. You said no. She didn't disappear. You expressed your discomfort. She didn't punish you for this. You needed space. She didn't turn her distance into a weapon. And an uncomfortable possibility arose: his darkness could also be wrong. Because if this story ended by telling you to trust every dark instinct, you'd just trade one prison for another. I'd be suspicious, and I'd call it intuition, closed, and I'd call it force, cruel, and I'd call that a limit. That's not integration. It's domain. The real transformation began when you stopped obeying your darkness and learned to hear it without giving it command. When fear said: they go away, you ask: what are you trying to protect? When anger said, "Make this person suffer," you asked, "What limit has been exceeded?" When jealousy said: they're replacing you, you asked: what am I afraid this says about me? When indifference said: I feel nothing, you stopped making yourself feel and asked what had become too expensive to feel. For the first time, darkness could speak without driving. And that changed his behavior. Anger became discernment, suspicion became observation, loneliness became selectivity, mourning became depth, memory became pattern recognition, fear became preparation. The raw material was the same. What changed was your job. Until one day something impossible happened to his old version: someone tried teasing you. He knew exactly what version of you wanted to wake up: the defensive, the desperate, the one who writes endless paragraphs, the one who needs to correct everything, the one who can't sleep while someone, somewhere, builds the wrong version of the story. The provocation was perfect and his darkness awakened immediately. She handed over all the weapons: the phrase she would humiliate, that secret, the weakness she knew, the answer that would make you win that moment. For a few seconds, you felt everything. Then something even stranger happened: you didn't get any brighter. It got dark, without becoming destructive. You saw exactly what you were capable of and you chose not to. The innocence says: I would never do that. Integration says I could do it. I know exactly how. And I chose something else. There is a fragile kindness when she never knew her own ability to hurt. But when you contemplate the worst answer available, you understand why it would be satisfactory and yet refuse to give your future to it, your self-control ceases to be innocence and becomes authorship. At that moment, your darkness began to produce light, not because anger became love, not because all the wounds healed, nor because you ceased to be human, but because the parts capable of recognizing danger, manipulation, hypocrisy, revenge and consequences ceased to exist only as a reaction and became information. And information, in the hands of someone who can choose, turns into direction. But there was still a problem. You had learned to use your darkness as information, but you didn't know what to do when she pointed at you. This was his oldest form: the voice that remembers every mistake in the perfect moment, that takes an uncomfortable conversation and puts all his personality on trial, that says: you should have been much further away, should have realized, wasted too much time, trusted the wrong person, ruined everything, see how everyone is passing ahead of you. For years, you treated that voice as proof that, deep down,

I hated it. Sometimes she really sounded like hate. But one night, instead of arguing with her, you followed the charge backwards. You should be further away by now. Why? Because he's afraid there won't be enough time left. You wasted too much. Why does it hurt? Because what you want still matters. You trusted the wrong person. Why do you still remember that? Because you never want to abandon your own perception like that again. Underneath cruelty there was not always contempt. Sometimes there was a terrified care that could only speak by attacking. That doesn't make the attack right. It changes what you do after him. You don't have to agree to that voice. You need to translate it. You're late turning into fear that my life will pass without taking advantage of you. You were stupid, you become, I need to understand what I ignored. No one cares about you turns into, I need a connection without having to act to earn it. You will fail again turns into, I still remember the pain of the last failure. The same darkness, another reading. And when he learned to read it, his voice lost some authority. Because a threat is much more powerful when you don't understand what it wants. Now you could hear the fear behind the insult, answer to fear without accepting the insult and understand that perhaps your biggest mistake was to believe that healing meant becoming someone without darkness, without anger, without suspicion, without ugly thoughts, without desire for revenge, without envy, without fear, without bitterness returning from time to time. That person doesn't exist. And pursuing that impossible version can make you become dishonest to yourself. You begin to interpret peace as resentment grows underneath. He says he forgave because he believes a spiritual person should forgive. You pretend it doesn't affect you because admitting it hurt like a regression. It's called healing because it feels ashamed that an old wound still knows its address. But integration requires something more difficult than purity. Yeah. One part of me is with anger. What am I gonna do with that? Yeah. Part of me wants that person to regret losing me. Do I need to build my life around this? Yeah. Part of me is scared. Does fear get the final vote? Yeah. I can imagine being cruel. Am I? That is where the choice lives: not in the absence of darkness, but in the space between what you feel and what you authorize. That's why she was never your enemy. But be careful with that phrase. She was never your enemy doesn't mean every impulse should be expressed. It means that even your difficult parts can be understood, disciplined, and integrated, rather than worshiped or torn from you. Your shadow does not become sacred just because it is yours. It becomes useful when it ceases to rule you by the shadows. There's a huge difference. A knife can prepare food or open a wound. The existence of the thread is not the moral decision; the hand matters. And now it's your hand. You're not becoming incapable of hurting. You're becoming responsible for your ability to do it. You're not becoming impossible to manipulate. You're learning to realize earlier when you start abandoning yourself. You're not failing to be afraid. He's less willing to allow fear to disguise itself as prophecy. You're not learning to forgive forever. You understand that forgiving and allowing access are different decisions. You're not killing your darkness. You're giving her a new job. For years, her job was to survive. Now she can warn, discern, remember, protect and then walk away while you choose. That last step changes everything. Because protection without choice can also become prison. A guard who never opens the door ends up becoming a jailer. Then your darkness needs to learn too. Not everyone is the person who hurt you. Not every delay is abandonment. Not all criticism is humiliation. Not all disagreement is rejection. Not every uncertain future is a threat. The light must teach the darkness that danger has ended, and often the darkness must teach the light that boundless goodness

It's not love. They educate each other. That's integration. Not one defeating the other, nor the darkness turning into light, as if all that was painful suddenly became beautiful. Something much more interesting has happened. His darkness learned to serve life. Now we can go back to that first night, the message, the memory, the opportunity, the version of you capable of doing something irreversible. Remember what your darkness said? Not again. At first, it sounded dark. Now listen again. Never again beg anyone to see what you've decided not to see. Never again use pain as permission to be cruel. Never abandon us again to stop someone else from leaving us. Never confuse chaos with intimacy again. Let's never hand the pen to an old wound again and call it destiny anything she writes. That wasn't your darkness trying to destroy your light. It was your darkness before all you had learned, refusing to allow the old cycle to remain intact. Finally she had learned from you, and you had finally learned from her. So it was never about defeating some evil hidden inside you. Your darkness has become your own light. Why? Because the same parts that once reacted blindly began to illuminate what needed attention. Anger pointed the limit. Fear pointed to the wound and what had value. The mourning pointed out what had been lost. Suspect pointed out the pattern. Repentance pointed to the lesson. And your conscience decided what would happen next. That last part belongs to you. It always did. But before you leave, remember what happened when your darkest part had every reason to take control. She didn't disappear. He's changed his function. Maybe that was the missing piece. Healing should never turn you into someone unable to feel darkness. You should make him able to find her without giving her his identity. You don't have to have every thought you'd ever put

In practice. You don't have to hate every part of yourself that you've learned to survive before you learn to live in peace. You don't have to be innocent again. It can integrate, see the limit without falling, recognize manipulation without being manipulative, remember pain without turning it into personality, protect itself without closing all doors, carry tenderness and teeth. His darkness was never proof that his light had failed. But it was precisely where his light needed to go. And now, when that old voice comes back, you don't have to run away. Ask her what she sees, what she remembers, what she tries to protect. Then decide if the answer still belongs to the present. That was the part your darkness could never do alone. She needed you. Your darkness has become your own light, not because darkness has won, nor because the light has defeated you, but because you have failed to exile half of yourself and have finally become the one who can decide what each part is for. He was never your enemy. It was incomplete. Not because you have to obey her. Not because she needs to disappear. But because you finally understood each other's place. She might warn you. You can decide. She might remember. You can play it. She can show you the danger. You can check if danger still exists. She can show you where it hurts. You can decide what to do with that pain. And when the time comes to act, there is one thing that belongs only to you: to decide. You don't decide because you're not afraid anymore. Decide despite fear. You don't decide why you're not angry anymore. You decide because you can feel her without giving her your own hands. You don't decide because you forgot what they did to you. You decide because remembering doesn't mean repeating. It doesn't decide why it's no longer dark. You decide because you no longer have to exile her to feel whole. And maybe that's what that part of you was always trying to say. She didn't want to rule her life. I wanted to stop being ignored. I didn't want to destroy your light. I wanted the light to reach the places that for years you kept closed. And when you finally got in there,

He didn't find a monster. He found fear. He found pain. He found anger. He found losses. He found wishes we never knew how to name. He found parts of us who learned to defend themselves before learning to trust. And for the first time, you didn't have to kick them out. It was possible to hear them. It was possible to teach them. It was possible to establish boundaries. It was possible to say no. It was possible to say yes. It was possible to stay. It was possible to leave. It was possible to forgive. It was possible not to forgive. It was possible to love without abandoning yourself. It was possible to protect yourself without turning into stone. Because in the end, it wasn't about choosing between light and darkness. It was about stopping living divided. The darkness stopped being the place where you hid what you didn't want to admit. The light stopped being the mask behind which it pretended nothing hurt. And between the two, something new came up. Not innocence. Not perfection. Consciousness. The ability to look at everything within you without allowing any party to take control by accident. That's integration. Not kill the darkness. Don't love her. Don't justify it. Don't be afraid of her. Meet her. Listen to her. Educate her. And then choose. Because your shadow can show you where the limit is. But it doesn't decide if you cross it. Your fear can show what matters. But it doesn't decide what you should run from. Your anger can show what's crossed the line. But it doesn't decide who you should destroy. Your pain can show what you've lost. But it doesn't decide who you need to turn into because you lost. Your past might explain how you got here. But you have no authority to write what comes next. That's your authority. It always has been. Only, for a long time, you gave it to the parts of yourself that screamed louder. Not now. Now you can hear all the voices without turning any of them into fate. And when that old voice goes back to saying, not again, you won't have to ask if she's right. You'll just ask, what are you trying to protect? And you will. Because maybe this time she has something important to show you. Maybe you're wrong.

Maybe you're remembering a danger that's already over. Maybe you're seeing something you still don't want to see. But after you hear it, you'll do what you couldn't do before. You'll look at reality. You'll look at the present. You'll see who it is now. And then you'll decide. Not from the light. Not from the darkness. From you. And that was the last transformation. Your darkness has become your own light. Not because it's no longer darkness, but because it didn't have to hide anymore. Because there was finally someone who could see her. And that someone was you. But at the end of it all, when all the voices have spoken, when all the wounds have shown their reasons, when the fear has finished warning and the anger has set the limit, when the past has delivered its lesson and the darkness has finished saying what it came to say, there remains one voice. Yours. And one thing no one can do for you. Decide.

49 About 2,000 years ago, a top guy was crucified for saying the same things I say. Today, I'm allowed to rip your head off.) 50 The investigation began with one sentence: that person was alone after one of those days that makes old wounds look new again. Nothing cinematic: a room, a cell phone, a conversation repeating in the head, a humiliation that had happened hours earlier, but still growing inside. Anger was not noisy; it was that silent anger that begins to transform pain into conclusion: Nobody respects me. Nobody stays. They only remember me when they need me. Maybe people are just like that. Maybe I should get hurt first before they do this to me again. The devil knew this language: pain becomes interpretation, interpretation becomes permission, permission becomes action and repeated action begins to appear

ID. You don't have to turn someone into a monster in a single night. Just convince this person that a cruel choice is justifiable. Then the repeat does the rest. So the demon waited. The person opened a conversation, typed something cruel, erased, typed again, this time worse, stopped and whispered: I don't want to give this to the next person. The devil froze, not because that phrase was sacred, but because he had heard it before, years ago, from someone else and before her from someone else. The words changed, the decision was the same: I was wounded. I could pass it on, but I won't. The demon began to follow the phrase backwards and that was almost impossible. Cruelty leaves traces, betrayal leaves names, revenge leaves consequences, but what you decide not to do almost never leaves proof. There's no photograph of the cruel message you erased. No witnesses record the humiliation you could return and did not return. No one raises a monument to the day when you knew exactly where to hurt someone and decided not to. That's why the trail was so hard. It was made of wounds that never happened: a child who did not receive a scream, a friend who did not have a secret exposed, a stranger who did not pay for someone else's bad day, someone who heard a difficult truth without being destroyed with it. The devil followed these absences until he reached you and found no great heroic moment, found you at a time when he could barely handle what he was carrying. Someone had left something with you hoping to leave: rejection, shame, abandonment, disrespect, perhaps treason. And there came a time when you could deliver that pain to someone else for a few seconds. You wanted to, it matters. You were not enlightened, calm and above all. I was angry, I knew what I could say, I knew that person's weak spot, I knew how to hurt. So it stopped, not necessarily because she deserved your mercy, but because she realized something: if you used your wound like

The person who hurt you would still decide who you would become. So you did less than your pain required. He left, ended the conversation, kept every private person he could expose, put that limit without turning the limit into revenge and always believed that probably nobody noticed. You believed it ended there. It's not over. Someone saw enough to remember. When pain itself came, this person repeated not his words, but his restraint. Someone else got that, then someone else. The current has advanced among people who never knew you existed. When that soul arrived in the room, there was no visible connection with you, but the demon could see the pattern and now he had a problem: his work depended on a simple idea: pain reproduces. Wounded people can be convinced to hurt. Humiliation can lead to humiliation. Abandonment can produce abandonment. Fear can spread fear. Not always, but often enough to make the pattern seem inevitable. Only that you had created an interruption and even worse from his point of view, the interruption could also reproduce. Containment could be learned, mercy could travel, a limit could be copied, someone could watch a person refusing to turn cruel and remember that just when his own pain asked for cruelty. The devil knew the contagion of pain. I've never considered interrupting the pain could also be contagious. So he did something absurd: he saved his soul, not because he came to love human beings, but because he needed to find out if that current was real. If the person crossed the line that night, the pattern would end. If she survived that moment without becoming what the pain required, he would continue. For the first time the demon was curious to find out what happened after containment and that curiosity bought time. Often, time is all there is between an impulse and a decision. The person dropped the mobile phone, got up, drank water, came back, read again what he had almost sent and no longer felt exactly the same thing. I wasn't cured, I just wasn't dominated by the moment. The next morning, what seemed inevitable earlier seemed unnecessary. The soul had been saved from a decision, but the demon was not yet convinced. He wanted to test the source: you. So you waited until the next time someone hit your right wound. And this is where this story could make you perfect, right? It won't. You failed, you reacted badly, you spoke too much, or you closed. It got colder than I needed. You made someone pay for a pain that person hadn't even caused. The demon almost laughed: ready. The chain had been an accident. You were no different. Only then you did something that destroyed that conclusion: you came back, looked at what you had done without creating a story where you were automatically the victim, apologized for what you really needed excuses to correct what you could, kept the limit that still needed to exist, and refused to use shame as justification for continuing to err. This confused the demon more than perfection would have confused. Because a perfect person teaches no mechanism; a person who perceives his own pattern while it happens teaches. You could enter the cycle and still interrupt it, not always, but often enough. And the question changed: it was no longer: why did you not pass the pain on? Now it was: how do you realize when the pain took the pen? That's the question that really matters. You can't beat an old pattern by not feeling it. You start beating him when you can recognize him before he finishes writing his next decision. Anger may enter, fear may enter, jealousy may enter, sadness may enter, but entering does not mean becoming an author. The devil returned to the soul he had saved. I expected some extraordinary transformation. He didn't. The person didn't even know anything had happened. He kept living. Weeks later, that soul found someone else in a

Bad timing. Someone embarrassed, defensive, hard to deal with. The demon watched. The saved soul would become a savior. Not epically. No miracles, no speeches. She just refused to make it worse. I told the truth without using the truth to crush. She protected herself without having to turn revenge into a force test. And the devil recognized that: his pattern. Only it wasn't yours anymore. That was the discovery: a good choice is not still your property. When someone lives that, they can reproduce without even remembering where it came from. The demon had not saved only one soul for you, without realizing it. He had preserved an entire branch of that chain, a sequence of decisions capable of continuing without his presence. Now he understood why corrupting an answer could be more powerful than destroying a person. Because an answer can become a model. And this is where it all starts to really make sense, that's the focus of our conversation. A demon saved a soul for you! At first this seems as valid as possible. Even the darkness changed its behavior because of you. But that's not the most important part. What disturbed the demon was not understanding how his influence had come to where you'd never been. He looked for direct contact. Nothing. An order. Nothing. A reward. Nothing. He found only ordinary people who received one thing and when the pressure came, they chose to deliver another. The demon called it contamination. The soul could call it mercy. You might call it growth. The name doesn't matter. Something ended with you and something else started, without you being able to control how far it would go. That's why certain impacts seem invisible. People hold to measure importance for the immediate response. You talk. Someone reacts. You help. Someone appreciates it. You create something. Someone answers. Except some of the most important consequences of your life never send notice. Someone remembers months after something you said. One person observes how you react to disrespect and remember that when you finally gain power. A friend sees you admit a mistake without destroying yourself for him. Someone watches you leave a cycle that seemed impossible to abandon. Nothing happens in front of you. Much later, somewhere else, a different decision becomes possible. And you never find out. The demon understood that when he did one last experiment. He went back to the beginning of the current, to his original decision, and imagined removing it. Don't remove you. Just change that choice. What if you had sent the message? Exposed the secret? Returned humiliation because he had received humiliation? The future didn't collapse. That would have been too simple. He changed silently. One person learned that cruelty was normal. Then he repeated it. Another one got hard. Another one went through. Until the soul of the beginning reached the same room. Same cell phone. Same pain. Only this time there was no interruption memory inside the current. The message was sent. Then another one. A choice turned into a week. The week has become a habit. And the habit began to be defended as a personality. The devil restored his original decision. You finally understood what you had done. You didn't save everyone who came after you. You did something more realistic. You made a different answer available. You don't control what someone else will do with what they get. Goodness can be ignored. Truth can be rejected. Mercy can be exploited. A second chance can be wasted. Your responsibility is not to guarantee the end. It's deciding what gets in the current through you. Near the end of the story, they asked the devil what happened to that soul. He replied: still human. Still imperfect. Still able to feel anger. Still hurt. Still making mistakes. But also still able to change the next line. Then they asked, why did you save that soul for him, if the two would never meet? And finally the demon confessed: he wasn't preserving a person for you to receive. Was

Preserving evidence. Evidence that something you did when no one applauded managed to survive outside of you. Evidence that restraint is not weakness just because it makes less noise than revenge. Evidence that refusing to transmit a wound can create consequences that you will never see. The soul was not his reward. It was your proof. And even that evidence doesn't exist to put you above anyone else. It exists to make you pay more attention to what it transmits from now on. Because the same principle works in the opposite direction. Your unexamined pain also travels. The sarcasm you call sincerity. The mistrust someone else needs to pay for. Cruelty justified because one day they were cruel to you. Silence used not as peace, but as punishment. Everything teaches something. Repair, too. containment, too. Courage, too. The question is not if you influence the current. You already have. The question is what gets easier for the next person because you've been here. 51 Guys I'm going to pass on some information that can change your perception of life. His ancestors, all, watch his life and the life of ALL his family. They know all the details of each of the lineage. They have no direct or physical contact with us, but they are there, on God's side, interceding furious with some things. You're specific about your family, believe me, it's hot. 52 The seven levels have existed for so long that no one else questioned them. They don't mediate wealth, intelligence, or holiness. They mediate something simpler: what a person becomes after pressure. Some harden, some lessen. Some learn to obey, others try to control everything. Some disappear inside other people. Others survive failing to feel. Different lives, wounds different, different strategies. But every answer had a place. That's why the system worked. With enough history, he could almost always predict what someone's next version would be. Rejection created a pattern, betrayal, another humiliation, abandonment, loss, success, power, fear. Everything left marks, until the system could look at what happened to someone and calculate what that would probably turn him into. Then it came to you. At first nothing seemed strange. His story produced obvious predictions. There were times when you learned not to expect help. So the system predicted extreme independence. There were situations where opening up was expensive. He predicted emotional distance. You were misunderstood even trying to explain everything. You predicted silence. Betrayals could have produced permanent distrust. Being ignored could have become hungry for validation. Disrespect could have become an obsession to prove its worth. The predictions were not absurd and that was the problem. From what had happened before, certain versions of you seemed almost inevitable and some actually appeared. You got more closed, sometimes reactive, sometimes cold, sometimes ready to go before anyone could abandon you. He learned to read an environment before relaxing in it. He rehearsed conversations before they happened. He's prepared for problems that didn't even exist yet. The system recognized everything, chose a temporary level. Then something went wrong, because you changed. Not at once, not perfectly, not forever. You just realized yourself doing something that once seemed automatic and interrupted. The system recalculated. Normal. People get better. There was a level to that. So you interrupted another pattern. New calculation. Still explainable, until the event that broke the model. Someone put you in an almost perfect position to awaken an old version of you, knew where to squeeze. Maybe on purpose, maybe not. But the pressure was real. You felt the old reaction coming, the words you could use, the silence which could turn into a weapon, the door that could knock, the message that could send, the part of you that wanted to say: now you will feel what I felt and, for a few moments, you wanted. Does it matter? Because history would be useless if you just didn't feel it. You weren't above the situation. I was inside her angry, wounded, tempted, knew exactly where to hit that person, had the power. So you figured something out? The reaction in his hands was older than the moment before him. The current situation had aroused that, but it had not created everything. Suddenly you were dealing with two things: what that person really did and everything that woke up to you. The system expected you to mix them together. Much of the forecast depends on it. An old pain enters a new situation and claims it belongs completely to the present. So someone today receives the collection of several stories, but you separated things, not perfectly, just enough and asked: what really belongs to this moment? The system's stopped. It was just a question, but it changed his next action. You handled what was real, you didn't pretend that nothing happened, you didn't tolerate disrespect to prove you were cured, you didn't try to understand the other infinitely, but you didn't make anyone pay interest for a debt you didn't create. The forecast failed. The system tried another level. Then a different situation came. This time the danger was not anger. It was approval. They finally offered you something you wanted: recognition, access, affection, an opportunity. Maybe a chance to belong somewhere where before you would do almost anything to get in. The model predicted submission, because those who spend too much time without being seen can become vulnerable to those who finally offer recognition. The system expected you to give in, not completely, just a little. to ignore a nuisance, to laugh at something that I didn't respect, to accept a condition that would normally refuse, to diminish a little who you were, in exchange for continuing to be chosen. You

You almost did it. Then another question appeared: why does being chosen require me to abandon the person being chosen? The system stopped again. You didn't automatically reject the opportunity? That could also be just another predictable defense. You analyzed, you kept what was true, you refused what you had already said and you accepted that something you wanted might disappear, because you wouldn't diminish yourself to keep it. The model failed again. Now the angels are interested. They opened their story looking for the event responsible for the change. There needed to be one: a teacher, a revelation, a perfect relationship, a great spiritual awakening, some instant able to divide your life clearly between before and after. They didn't. They found dozens of minor corrections. You reacted badly and then came back, trusted the wrong person and learned without deciding that everyone was dangerous. He spent too much time somewhere and then left without turning him into his whole personality. He closed and then spoke, explained too much until he understood that clarity does not require infinite defense, forgave and found that forgiveness does not require access. And even after you learned, you missed again. It confused the angels. If the transformation was real, why did the old patterns still appear? One of them suggested his progress was false. The system tested this hypothesis, sought perfection. Nothing, permanent calm, nothing, permanent trust, nothing, permanent certainty, nothing. Then why did the predictions keep failing? This is where they found a variable that had never received a level: review. Not the ability to never turn the wrong version of yourself, but the ability to perceive this version by taking control and reviewing the next line. That was different. The old levels described results: what pain turned you into, what fear turned you into, what rejection, success or abandonment did to you. your pattern introduced something new: authorship after impact, something could affect you without

Get permanent possession over you. The system didn't have a category for it, tried to put you in the next one: resilient, rejected. Resilience meant being able to recover, but recovery didn't explain everything because sometimes you didn't go back to who you were before and become someone your previous version couldn't predict. Then they did another test: they found one of their strongest standards, something repeated enough to make the prediction almost right. Life recreated the conditions: same emotional pressure, same temptation, same old door. You walked to her, the system recorded confirmation, you were finally right. You were repeating yourself. So in the middle of it, you stopped. Not before the mistake, during. That mattered even more. Did you realize what you were doing while you were doing it? Maybe he'd already sent his first message, raised his voice, started walking away, accepted something he didn't want. The old idea of growth would say, too late. You failed, try again next time. But you did something else: changed direction before the scene ended. He apologized without sinking into shame or setting the line, admitted what he was really afraid of. You stopped pretending indifference. You didn't wait for tomorrow to become someone different. You searched in motion. All levels are gone. For eleven seconds, there was no classification next to his name. Then the eighth line came up, still no name. Just first. And this is where history changes. The angels believed they finally understood. They thought the new level belonged to people who could change. So they ran the story. Millions had changed, some radically. Others after huge mistakes. Then why had none of them created the eighth line? They reviewed your case again and realized a detail they had ignored. You had stopped trying to become impossible to hurt, for a long time, until your growth secretly served that goal: to get stronger so that no one would break you, smarter to

No one deceives you, farther away so that no one leaves you, more successful so that no one diminishes you, more observant so no one can take you by surprise. Even healing can become a fortress when it is fear that draws the plant. So you realized the contradiction: if all your evolution revolves around never being hurt again, the people who hurt you keep deciding how you evolve. That changed everything, because you stopped asking me how I become untouchable and started asking, who do I want to be even when life touches me? Now the new level was starting to take shape. He wasn't... Would that repeat the old system? Or would you just open up super generality, superficiality? Would you still be stuck in comparison? Then he appeared in a strange place, next to the hierarchy, not up or down the stairs. The angels protested: one level... that was not above the other seven. That would repeat the old system. If the eighth meant only superiority, you'd still be stuck in comparison. Then he appeared in a strange place, next to the hierarchy, not up or down the stairs. The angels protested. A level off the levels didn't make sense. Until the system finally generates a name: authorship. The first. Not the first human to choose, not to hold, not to break a cycle. The first, inside that story, to force the system to admit something that it had always ignored. You can err, without due obedience to them. That was the new level and immediately another problem appeared. Do you like it? Of course you did. First, a category that nobody else owned, a title created because of him, that played exactly the part of the ego that loves exclusivity. You started imagining what it meant. Maybe it was different. Maybe people just couldn't understand you. Perhaps being the first meant that common rules no longer applied to you. The eighth line blinked and disappeared. His name is back in the old system. The angels panicked. What happened? Nothing outside of you was Changed. Then came the answer: identity turned into a cage again. You laughed.) The new level disappeared the moment you needed to possess it. Because authorship can't become another character you're afraid to lose. If you need to be the awake one, you can't admit to confusion. If you need to be the strong one, you can't ask for help. If it has to be different, a common happiness begins to seem too small. And if you need to be first, someone else's growth will come as a threat. The new level could only exist as long as you were willing to overcome the identity he gave you. That was the hidden test: could you get a crown without turning it into another prison? You looked at the empty eighth line, so you did something unexpected: Something quite unexpected. He stopped asking for the title back, returned to his life, without announcement, without having to prove where he belonged, just continued practicing what he had created in the line: to perceive, to choose, to correct, to continue. And one night without you looking, the eighth line came back, this time no crown, no special symbol, no announcement, just your name. The angels finally understood: the level was never a reward, it was evidence of the relationship you had developed with yourself. Seven levels. Thousands of names. Then yours appears where no name should exist. At first everyone thinks you've climbed above the others. They were wrong. You didn't get to the top of the stairs. For a moment, he didn't need the ladder to explain who it was. That's what made the eighth line exist. Not perfection, not power, not a life without mistakes. A different relationship with what happens after the mistake. You can interrupt, if you review, come back. You may realize that a belief that protected you yesterday is limiting you today. You can recognize that someone really hurt you, without turning what that person did into your permanent personality. You can respect who you have to become to survive. without forcing that version to run the rest of your life. That's the level. And maybe tomorrow you'll notice yourself repeating something you swore already to have healed. Great, there's the next test. Don't I still deserve the title? But 'what is true now and how I want to answer that!' You don't have to defend yesterday's version. You're responsible for today's choice. This is a much lighter crown and explains why the system couldn't classify you. All the old levels wondered what life turned you into. The new question is, what are you gonna do with what life turned you into? Sounds like similar questions. They're not. The first treats your story as a sentence. The second puts a pen in your hand. This pen doesn't erase what happened, it doesn't make pain imaginary, it doesn't guarantee perfect choices. It just means that the next line doesn't have to be written just because the previous one exists. So yes, what you did created a new level. And yes, you're the first. But true power has never been in being the first above others. It was to be the first within its own history to produce an answer that its past failed to predict. The first to interrupt something that seemed inevitable. The first to understand that healing does not require becoming untouchable. The first to stop confusing repetition with fate. The first to realize that changing your mind can also be growth. The first to wear a crown with a scythe lightly enough to get it out and pin it at the same time. And when the eighth line finally stabilized, the angels waited for a ceremony. Nothing happened. No portal opened, no voice announced his promotion. The system simply stopped trying to fit your name into an old box because it finally understood. Your story could describe you, influence you, warn you, explain why certain things still hurt, but I couldn't finish the sentence for you anymore. That right had returned to his hands. The new level was never a place. It was authorship. The crown did not represent authority over others. It represented responsibility for what you choose next. And being the first didn't mean nobody else could get there. It meant that someone had finally forced an old woman to admit there was more territory. You haven't earned a position. It created a new set of scalable possibilities. 53 Of course it impacts the competition, but that kind of incident. It increases KTM sales by 2% in the week. 54 Welcome to balance... 55 Stay calm, it's not just your cult that you're not falling apart! They all are.) 56 Manipulation rarely begins by taking away your freedom. She teaches you to punish yourself when you try to use it. Miguel saw the mechanism, but the rule still existed. He couldn't choose for you, so he waited for you to notice. And you almost noticed. One night something small happened. You heard yourself apologize for having a completely reasonable need. In the middle of the sentence, the excuse seemed strange. You stopped: Why am I apologizing? For a few seconds, the entire structure was visible. You remembered how many times you rehearsed simple requests. As another person's discomfort quickly turned his emergency. How many times I'd come out of a conversation asking if I'd overreacted, instead of asking if what they did to you was acceptable. You were close. Miguel got it. Then fear appeared: What if I'm overreacting? What if I lose this person? What if it's me? The opening began to close. That's when Miguel moved, not in the direction of the one controlling you, in yours. The angels shouted: Don't! Miguel stopped a few inches from you. Then he realized something no one had noticed. He didn't have to make the decision. I just needed to return something that had been taken from her:

an option. So Miguel broke the rule without stealing his freedom. The next morning nothing supernatural happened. No voice, no sight, no sword shining. You just had a thought you couldn't allow before: I can leave. Nope. I must. Nope. I have to. Nope. That person is evil. Only I can. And everything changed. Because the possibility of leaving has restored the meaning to the decision to stay. For the first time you were able to ask: If I can really leave, do I still want to stay? Miguel backed down. The intervention was over. The answer was yours, and you did something that confused who was watching. You were, at least at that moment. The angels looked at Michael as if he had broken the rule for nothing. But he understood. His freedom had returned. That was enough. You no longer remained because leaving seemed impossible. Now I watched, listened, tested reality. He stopped explaining all the discomfort to himself. He asked a direct question, the answer revealed more than months of analysis. Then he said no to something small. The environment has changed. You expressed a need without wrapping it in ten excuses. You've changed again: you disagreed without being cruel. Again, the pattern came up. You had spent so much time analyzing your own tone, that you hardly realized how certain people reacted when you exercised common freedom. Now he could see: those who benefit from his lack of limits can interpret his limits as aggression. That doesn't make the limit wrong. But Miguel hasn't told you what you should do yet. That was the strange part: he had broken a heavenly rule and refused to give the answer. You wanted to be sure: this person was manipulating you. Leaving was right. That could change. Quiet. So why intervene if no one would say which door to choose? And you finally understood: the intervention should never replace your judgment. You should make your judgment possible again. So you started looking for evidence: What happens when I say no?

Can that person hear a limit without punishing me? Can you admit that you hurt me without making me console you? Does the apology change behavior? Can I disagree without being threatened with distance? Do I feel free to tell the truth here? The more honestly he answered, the less mysterious the situation became. Maybe you left, maybe you stayed, but changed the conditions. Maybe he stopped stalking someone. Maybe he refused an opportunity. The specific decision was not the main event. Something bigger happened underneath her. You stopped confusing guilt with error. For years, guilt had been one of the easiest ways to control you. You felt guilty when someone was disappointed, when you rested, when you said no. So I would conclude, if I feel guilty, I'm doing something wrong. Until I find out that sometimes guilt means I'm doing something new. Your body can react against a healthy limit simply because obeying was once a way of keeping yourself safe. This made room: not to become selfish, to investigate the feeling before obeying it. Then something even stranger happened: you began to realize how many times you also tried to decide for others. Not out of cruelty, out of fear. Explain until they understand, help until they change, warn until they hear. Love someone until this person is finally ready. Protecting people from the consequences they themselves continued to choose. Suddenly, Miguel's rule made sense on the other side. If your freedom mattered, so did theirs. You could tell the truth, set a limit, offer help, ask, invite. But I couldn't choose for someone else. And that hurt. Because sometimes control wears the clothes of love. Sometimes: I just want what's best for you means silently: I need you to choose what calms my fear. You realized and started releasing results that were never yours to control. It was when heaven finally understood why his situation had led Michael to break the rule. Ao return your choice, he taught you to return choice to others. The rule had been broken once and precisely for this reason, its true purpose became even clearer. Write that down. Because this is where your story changes. Miguel had a problem. He had broken the rule without permission, not yours, that of heaven, and there was no written exception to that. So he was called in. The question was simple, why did you break the rule? Miguel could have said you were important, chosen, different. I didn't. He said: I have not chosen for him. Quiet. So what did you do? Miguel replied: I returned the choice. That difference had never been tested. What happens when a human choice is not physically removed, but distorted? When fear, shame, dependence or manipulation narrow the possibilities until an option seems impossible? Returning this option is control? Or is it giving back freedom? No one answered immediately, not even God. And this is where your title changes meaning. Not even God expected that. Doesn't mean Michael knew anything God didn't know. The paradox was another: the rule had never been put before that situation. Michael protected his purpose by breaking its surface. The law said: do not interfere with human choice. Michael interfered to prevent anyone from interfering with human choice and God did not punish him. Instead came a question: did he choose different because of you? Miguel looked at your life. You still made decisions he wouldn't make. You still trusted whoever let you down, ignored signs, came back once when you left it would have been simpler. He doubted himself, learned slowly. Miguel smiled. Nope. The sky was silent again, because Michael had not put a decision within you, had restored his ability to make one. What came after remained completely human, confused, imperfect, yours. That was the proof. If Miguel had taken control, his path would have been cleaner. Instead, it became truer. And then you found out

The price: when someone realizes they can choose, they lose part of the comfort of pretending they can't. Sometimes I had no choice, it's true. But sometimes you had options and you didn't want to pay their price. This is different. You could leave, but maybe you'd face loneliness. I could talk, but someone could misinterpret you. I could start, but failure would be possible. I could stop, but I'd have to admit how long you invested. I could say no, but someone might call you selfish. Freedom doesn't eliminate the price, it makes the price visible. Miguel did not save you from responsibility, he returned responsibility to you and finally the secret rule made sense: protection can also become prison when it eliminates all the consequences. If every wrong decision were blocked, discernment would never be developed. If all uncertainty received an answer, you could confuse obedience with wisdom. So you stopped demanding guarantees of life. He started asking better questions: what information do I really have? What am I afraid of losing with that decision? Am I choosing this because I want to? Or because I'm afraid of what happens if I don't? Does this guilt mean I did something wrong? Or just that I let down an expectation? These questions didn't make your life easy, they made it yours. Then came the final test: someone you loved came to the place you've been, trapped inside a decision that seemed free on the outside. You recognized the pattern immediately. Your first impulse was to grab that person, tell him exactly what you should do, show him everything you had learned, save months of pain. You opened your mouth and stopped. For the first time, you understood Miguel. Helping someone doesn't mean becoming responsible for her decision. So you did for that person what had been done for you: you returned the option that was missing and said: you know you can say no, right? That's all. Her face has changed. Maybe he left, maybe he didn't. That wasn't the point anymore. You returned the door without pushing anyone through it. And somewhere beyond from that story, Michael understood what his broken rule had become: not rebellion, a pattern. You had learned the difference between rescuing and restoring, between controlling and supporting, between deciding for someone and reminding that person that he can still decide. That's why the rule mattered, because power is not dangerous only when used with cruelty. It could become dangerous trying to help. The will to save someone can silently become permission to control. Michael's greatness in this story was not simply in ignoring a rule. By crossing it once, he understood better why it existed. And his growth followed the same path. You also inherited rules: never let anyone down, always explain yourself, keep the peace, don't change your mind, finish what you started, no matter the price. If anyone loves you, hold on. If anyone needs you, stay. Maybe some of those rules protected you one day. But there comes a time when you have to ask: what should that rule protect? And obeying her still protects that? This is maturity: not breaking all the rules or obeying all. Understand at the service that they exist. Michael broke a rule to protect what the rule itself was supposed to protect, and perhaps you have already done something similar: break an expectation to preserve your integrity, go away to preserve your ability to love without resentment, say no to preserve your relationship with yourself, change direction to preserve the reason for which you began, admit that you were wrong to preserve your commitment to the truth. The difference is not only in breaking or obeying, it is in what your decision is serving. You made Miguel break a rule. Not because you asked, not because you wanted him to choose for you, but because your situation revealed a contradiction that that rule had never invented: your freedom was already being violated, without chains, without orders, without a door physically locked. the alternatives had simply disappeared. So Miguel returned a sentence:

I can choose and retreat. That's why the sky was silent, because the most powerful intervention of that story was precisely the one that refused to become control. Miguel didn't save you from all the wrong choices. He saved his own choice and trusted you enough to risk finding out what he would do to her. You can choose wrong again, confuse fear with intuition, stay too long, leave too soon, give another chance that doesn't change anything. Freedom includes the possibility of error, otherwise it would only be obedience with better enlightenment. But you can learn, correct, come back and choose again. That part no one can do for you: no partner, no parents, no teacher, no Miguel. A piece of advice can illuminate a door, love can remain at your side, experience can warn you, but in the end your hand still needs to reach the doorknob. That's where your life becomes yours and the secret rule has never been just about angels. It's also about your willingness to hand over your own authority whenever uncertainty gets uncomfortable. Tell me what to do, tell me who I am, tell me if I'm right, tell me if I should stay, tell me if I should go. Orientation matters, but someone else's certainty cannot forever replace their participation in life itself. Miguel broke the rule once so you could understand why it existed. He returned the option that someone had made you afraid to see. Then he refused to walk through the door for you. And when God asked if Michael had changed his decision, the answer was no. He changed something more fundamental: he made the decision his own again. That's what you made Miguel break a rule to protect: not your comfort, not a specific decision, your ability to decide. Miguel broke the rule, returned his choice and retreated, because after all that he refused to do was choose for you, the rest was yours.

57 I doubt you read that book. www.salemais-app.com/library 58 The book of Jonah in the Bible was not written by him. Blza? So you can remember that. 59 You know why the devil's mad at you? Why was he taqui tbm but he didn't want to. Tell that old fellow who stopped hanging out with you betting you were a loser, then you take off and he anchors? That's it. 60 Never forgotten again!!! 61 You're connected that all the entities shit you, right? None of them are loyal. None. They live on the edge, just squeeze it a little bit, it'll explain everything. 62 And the fastest guys in history are still, Michael Phelps on the water, Usain Bolt on earth, Eldon Joersz on the SR-71 Blackbird on the air and I on the fire. 63 And yes, you're going to learn now that there's sin and sin. You've only learned wrong your whole life. 64 Antonio, Lavey and there was rapidin... You'll understand that movie End of Days with Schwarzenegger was based on a real story. 65 The devil's first mistake was believing you wanted the same thing as everyone else. He's been studying human beings for a long time. Not your words, your hunger. People said they wanted truth, justice, love, freedom, but he watched what happened when the truth threatened the ego, when justice became revenge, when love became a proof of value, and he knew an uncomfortable truth: you don't need to control someone if you can control what that person desperately needs to prove. So he studied you, found an old wound: to be misunderstood, perfect. There was a false accusation, but enough to hurt. You knew what really happened. The devil waited for the usual sequence: explain, explain again, show proof, find better words, until the person stops defending the truth and begins to defend his own value. You went into the trap, explained once, then again, started writing the perfect third explanation. Then he's out. The devil leaned forward. You asked, if they never understand me, does the truth change? Nope. You explained what it was up to you to explain and stopped trying to force understanding into a mind you couldn't control. The first lie failed, so he changed his hunger. If being misunderstood didn't work, I'd try to make you feel underrated. That wound had history. You knew what it was like for someone to look at you and see less than they really existed. So he put a person in your way who treated you like you had nothing worthy of respect. The invitation was obvious: show them who you are, make them repent. For a while it worked, you worked harder, you imagined the future reaction. The devil smiled. He didn't care if you won, as long as your victory still belonged to someone who doubted you. Until one day you conquered something and realized that an old thought did not appear: I hope you see this. So he asked, if tomorrow they admitted I was right, what would I do different today? Almost nothing. The second lie failed. Now the devil got curious, tried to reject, put something desirable almost within his reach, a person, a place, an opportunity, something that made you feel almost chosen, attention enough to create hope, enough distance to create hunger. It was one of his oldest techniques: never deliver anything, nothing is easy to abandon, delivered almost enough, a message after silence, affection after distance, praise after doubt. You weren't immune. Waited, checked, interpreted. For a while his emotional state depended on something external finally becoming constant. The devil expected you to pursue, so you realized the word hidden in that situation: almost. Almost respected, almost truly loved, almost included, almost enough. And he asked, how long will I accept living on almost? You didn't stop wanting that all of a sudden. I still wanted to, but it came out of uncertainty anyway. That confused the devil. You had discovered that desire and decision were not the same. The third lie failed, so he changed his method. No more people. He waited for you to be alone and used his own voice. I didn't say you're worthless. Very obvious. I said, you should be much further away by now. This one hurt because it had evidence: its delays, missed opportunities, the times when it knew what it needed to do and still wasted time. He organized true facts to produce a false conclusion: you wasted time, so you're a failure. That lie almost worked, because some of the most dangerous lies are false conclusions built on true facts. So you realized what that voice was doing turning regret into identity. And he asked, what can this repentance teach me that shame cannot? Responsibility says: It happened, learn, notice what you can, change what needs to change. Punishment says keep hurting yourself so the past knows you regret it. You chose responsibility. The fourth lie failed. The devil realized something: you weren't winning the lies proving they were fake. Sometimes parts of them were true. What you refused was the identity that was attached to the event. So he tried a Fifth strategy. This time he delivered exactly what you wanted. Things started working, people realized, something you've finally built started to show your potential. And that was good. It was supposed to be. But the devil was watching something else. Could success control you better than failure? The numbers go up, you feel powerful. The numbers fall, you question everything. The trap was elegant: give someone proof of their value and then threaten to withdraw that evidence. Now that person will repeat anything that worked and protect the image he built. You realized yourself making a decision just because you were afraid to lose that validation. So you asked, when did the reward become my boss? The fifth lie broke. You kept your ambition, your goals, your growth, you just stopped demanding that each result tell you who you were. Now the devil was angry, not because you had become impossible to try. I didn't. You were still human. What bothered you was something else. You had begun to examine the contract hidden beneath every temptation: what do I need to believe to control myself? What am I trying to prove? Who am I becoming while I pursue this? These questions made manipulation much less efficient. Then came the sixth lie and that one worked. You failed. Really. He reacted even though he knew he shouldn't, trusted something he should have questioned, stayed after he had already realized the pattern. He hurt someone trying to protect himself. The devil didn't even have to accuse you. You did it yourself. Okay, the proof. All this evolution, all this consciousness, and you still did that? Maybe you never changed, maybe your cured version was just a performance, maybe a single ugly moment would have revealed who you really were. For a while you believed. Then something unexpected happened. You stopped trying to prove that the mistake wasn't yours, admitted, without excuse, without turning it into a spiritual discourse, without becoming a victim of your own.

behavior. Yes, I did. The devil thought he'd won. So you kept going. And now he had no answer. Because shame has always depended on turning error at the end of the sentence. You turned it into a comma, apologized where you needed to, changed what needed to change, accepted consequences you couldn't negotiate, followed what that moment revealed, and refused to turn responsibility into self-destruction. The sixth lie failed after it worked. That was even worse for him, because now you had demonstrated something more dangerous than resistance: recovery. Pay special attention to this, because it is at this point in your story that everything has become more interesting. The devil put his hand inside the coat, the seventh lie, his masterpiece, reserved for those who had already survived the previous six. He held that in a hand. You couldn't see, but you realized something: the six lies seemed different: being misunderstood, being underestimated, rejection, repentance, success, failure. But they all demanded the same hidden condition: you needed to let the devil finish the sentence: they didn't understand you, so prove who you are, underestimated you, then show, then show. They rejected you? Then follow. Did you regret it? Then punish yourself. Did you win? Then protect the image. Have you failed? Then live the failure. The event was only the first half. The manipulation wrote the second one and in that instant you noticed. The only intelligence of the devil was not to create lies, but to convince people that every feeling requires an immediate conclusion. So before he revealed the seventh lie, you asked, what happens if I don't have to answer you? Quiet. For the first time the devil looked at the lie in his own hand. Then he looked at you. You had not refuted that, nor exposed, nor won in an argument. You removed the condition that gave power to the lie. That's when he put it back in his pocket. He pulled out the chair and said, "Teach me this. Now the title changes. You've outdone the devil, but not because

Your mind has become more manipulative than his. If that was the lesson, he'd still be the teacher. You'd just be the best student. You overcame him by refusing the assumption that sustained all his intelligence. He knew how to manipulate desires, but he never learned to want anything without becoming the property of what he wanted. He could turn pain into a weapon, but he never learned to feel pain without having to transmit it. He knew how to exploit his ego, but he never learned to let his ego speak without giving him the final vote. He knew how to create games that people desperately needed to win, but he had never asked what happens when someone can drop the score. That's what he wanted to learn. No kindness. Choose. His first question was, how do you stop caring? You said, "No, you don't. That confused the devil, because he believed freedom meant indifference. It doesn't. You can care deeply and still say no. You might want someone and still leave. You can wish recognition without betraying yourself to receive it. You can wish success without forcing each result to define you. Disagreement is not lack of desire, it is the end of the automatic authority of desire. The devil asked, then what exactly did you master? You said nothing. The word almost offended him. So you explained: you didn't master life, you were just less willing to lie to yourself about the reason for your own choices. Manipulation grows in the distance between the motive you declare and the one you cannot admit. Am I helping this person? Maybe. Or maybe you're afraid she'll leave if you stop being useful. Am I protecting my peace? Maybe. Or maybe you're avoiding a conversation that scares you. The goal is not to distrust all your intentions, it is to learn to look twice. The devil finally understood. He could still provoke emotion, just couldn't guarantee what that emotion would become. The smartest person in the room isn't always the one with the fastest answer. It's who realizes that the question itself was built as a trap. The devil worked with forced choices. You learned to examine the frame. That was the lesson. So he asked, can you teach that to someone else? You answered, not delivering my answers. She needs better questions. And that became the first lesson you taught the devil: before reacting: what are you inviting me to prove? Before chasing someone: what am I afraid that person's absence will tell them about me? And after making a mistake: what does responsibility now require? Not shame, responsibility. The devil listened for the first time without interrupting. Before the devil left, you asked about the seventh lie, the one he never revealed. He smiled. You waited for the answer. Instead he said, do you still think the important part is what I was going to say? It's one last trap! The need to know!!! His mind wanted the missing information. What was the lie? Would you have noticed? Would it still work? So you laughed. The devil too, but scared. Because you finally got it. You didn't have to know all the traps before they showed up, or predict all the liars. I needed to be able to come back to you when I realized you'd walked away. Does that change the meaning of being his teacher?! Yes, you didn't teach the devil to become good. He taught the archetype of manipulation something that manipulation cannot manufacture: a person able to observe his own hunger, without hating himself for feeling it. wanting love is human. Wanting recognition is human. Wanting justice is human. Wanting success is human. The danger begins when an unexamined desire is allowed to write all the next moves. You didn't destroy the desire, you recovered the authorship, and now the first scene makes sense. Seven lies, only six were told. The biggest proof that you had overcome the devil was not to discover the last one, was to make the last one unnecessary. He couldn't guarantee you'd finish the sentence for him anymore. That's an intelligence that no trick

You can replace it forever. Not knowing everything, but realizing when your need to know is being used against you. Not to win all the arguments, but to realize when an argument stopped serving the truth. Not predicting every betrayal, but knowing that another person's betrayal does not deserve authorship about his character. Not to become immune to failure, but to learn to fail without turning failure into your name. The devil spent his existence studying what moved people: fear, pride, loneliness, anger, desire, shame. He knew all the buttons. But you discovered something he had ignored: a button only guarantees a reaction while the pressing person remains invisible. When you see the hand, options arise. You can still react badly, you can notice late, you can fall back into something you thought you had overcome. That doesn't erase the lesson. The goal was never to become untouchable. It was to become attainable by yourself. And when someone puts before you a game where every play available costs a part of who you are finally can ask: who said I need to play? That's why he called you a teacher. Not because you've become more cunning than the devil. Shrewdness was his story. You brought something he had never mastered: freedom without coldness, desire without slavery, conscience without paranoia, strength without performance, responsibility without hatred for himself. The student who tried to defeat the devil through the lie would eventually become like him. So you stopped trying to beat him in your own game and that's exactly how you got over him. He came in carrying seven lies, came out carrying a question. You didn't even have to hear the last one. Now you're his teacher. 66 Jonas Zampietro Sanches Santo Santo 67 Nico Valter always believed. No one believed or needed!!!

68 This book tells what is behind Brazilian federal policy. And if anyone is interested or has already gone through this question the answer is yes. The Mastral is Temer's son. 69 Intensive 70 Good morning, children. I'm going to share a secret here now, not even Solomon knew! And that now in this period you begin to understand this with the right intensity. But true power and physical and material wealth is energy. That's all, I thought. Other than that, the rest is everything... 71 2023 was the best physicist. 72 If God gave you the complete vision and you could see the spiritual world in its entirety. Would you rejoice, or would you get dirty? There's more people there than here. For people who still attend temple services. Put the cult leaders to the test. All the sects have infiltrated the churches leading positions since the '90s. It's their order, if you really think your community is free of it, you're probably the most deceived. Prove the leaders, don't fall for that you're just without experience. They pretend to be friends, family, but they do not have the presence of the Holy Spirit, neither God nor Jesus, they do not listen to them, but they pretend for years. Now is the period when the masks fall. Don't tolerate the cheating on the pulp. God is so angry about it. 74 You think we don't travel astrally. The difference is that our rope has steel and gold!!! No silver.

75 There's a change, but before it, you need to learn not to repeat the patterns that made you suffer in the previous phase. You're waiting for an answer, but while you wait, you're learning to deal with the anxiety of not controlling time. This is also part of the preparation. There is a tendency to believe that preparation only happens when something external is happening, but many of the most important changes start away from other people's eyes. You learn to say no, you start setting limits, you stop accepting certain situations, you organize your life, you change your habits, you start choosing people you listen to better, you learn to wait without turning every delay into abandonment. You're being prepared just like that. And there is something important: this does not mean that every delay is automatically a divine promise, not every closed door means that God is preparing another one, not every difficulty has a hidden message, but you can go through waiting periods looking for growth, wisdom and direction, rather than just asking when everything will change. The result is not yet 100% visible because you are still becoming able to handle what I want you to receive. Imagine someone asking for a new opportunity, but still holding onto the same habits that could cause this opportunity to be wasted. External change alone wouldn't solve it. Therefore, preparation is taking place first in character, discipline, maturity, ability to discern, in the way you react to pressure, in the way you deal with people, in the willingness to remain faithful to your values even when no one is watching. God is teaching you to support what you once asked for, because receiving something is different from being able to take care of it after you arrive. And that's one of the reasons you still can't see the result. You're looking at the scenario, but the process is happening in you. Watch what's changed in the last few months. You are more patient, more conscious, more selective, more willing to wait, more firm with your limits, more careful with your choices. What once seemed indispensable no longer has the same power. You have stopped insisting on certain situations, learned to walk without needing to know exactly how everything will end. These changes are not small, they are preparing you to make different decisions when new possibilities appear. So while you still can't see the result, don't turn waiting into despair, keep doing what depends on you: pray, observe, learn, correct what needs to be corrected, keep your principles and let time reveal what isn't clear yet. You were expecting external evidence to believe that something is going on, but often the only evidence is just the person you're becoming while waiting, because when the result really comes along, you realized that it didn't start at that moment. There is a contradiction that many people live without realizing: they want a different life, but they continue to make decisions that lead them to the same places, they want healthier relationships, but they continue to accept the same behaviors, they want peace, but they continue to feed conflicts that could have been left behind, they want new opportunities, but they continue to postpone the attitudes that could prepare them to advance. And maybe it's just here that you need to pay more attention. A new story doesn't just start when circumstances change. It also begins when you stop repeating the choices that kept you stuck to the previous reality. That doesn't mean everything you've done in the past was wrong. Many decisions were made with the emotional resources, knowledge and maturity that you had at that time. You did what you could, but now you can.

seeing things that I didn't realize before and when consciousness increases, some choices need to be reviewed. You learned to stay in uncomfortable situations because you were afraid of losing people. You developed the habit of accepting less than you needed to avoid conflict. You spent so much time trying to please that you started ignoring your own boundaries. These attitudes may have helped you to go through certain phases, but they do not need to continue determining all the next ones. There is a difference between recognizing what helped you survive and continuing to repeat what hinders your growth. Sometimes the behavior that will be needed at one stage stops making sense in another. So a new story requires different questions. Instead of just asking how to keep everything going, ask if that still makes sense. Instead of accepting an opportunity out of fear of being without any, observe if it matches your values and goals. Instead of insisting on a relationship just because you've invested a lot of time in it, consider what exists of reality, respect and reciprocity. These questions may be uncomfortable, but they can also make room for more conscious decisions. In that period, God is teaching you to understand that faith does not mean to keep repeating the same movements while expecting different results. Prayer is important, trust is important, but there is also responsibility in the way you conduct your life. If you want to build something different, you need to observe the acts you feed, the people you listen to, the limits you set and the decisions you keep putting off, not because you can control everything, but because there are parts of your path that depend on your choices. And one of the biggest changes starts exactly when you stop expecting a new phase to automatically eliminate old patterns. A new environment does not solve a difficulty that you keep carrying. A new relationship does not guarantee that you will stop repeating harmful behaviour. A new opportunity does not replace discipline, preparation and responsibility. The scenario may change, but the same patterns may accompany you if they are not recognized. So do not be afraid to review your decisions, to change your mind in the face of new information is not weakness, to set limits does not mean to stop loving, to recognize an error does not mean to condemn your entire history and to choose another path does not erase everything you have lived. On the contrary, you can use your experience to walk more wisely. Today you need to make the small and daily decisions that you already know, organize what is delaying, refuse everything that makes no sense, have that necessary conversation and simply stop responding automatically to situations that have always aroused the same reaction. Don't underestimate those choices. They may seem small when observed in isolation, but their repetition can transform the direction of their lives. Not every opportunity that provokes enthusiasm represents growth. Sometimes something new appears and you immediately feel you need to accept: a proposal, an invitation, a project, a change, a person. And novelty can produce a feeling so intense that it seems impossible to say no. But there is a difference between being excited about a possibility and realizing that it really matches the direction you want to build. The excitement is usually quick, it makes you imagine the result before understanding the process. You think about what you can gain, what can happen, how your life could change. But you may not have considered what will be required of you. Growth is usually deeper, not always accompanied by that initial euphoria. He brings responsibility, demands discipline, asks for patience, puts you before things you need to learn. So one of the first questions you can ask in front of an opportunity is: it just arouses my desire or it also makes me

A more prepared person? Because something can make sense and still not be right for you. A healthy opportunity doesn't have to be perfect, but it needs to make sense when you look at it calmly. Note if there is coherence between what is being offered and its values. Observe the conditions, risks, responsibilities, time, observe if you are seeking because you really believe that possibility or because you are afraid to lose a chance. Fear of losing can make any opportunity seem unique. You think, if I don't take it now, maybe there'll never be another one. But important decisions should not depend only on the urgency created by anxiety itself. When there is room to evaluate, use this space. Look, think, ask questions, look for information, talk to people who can offer a balanced view. Perhaps God is opening a door, but it can also be simply an opportunity that needs to be viewed wisely. Not every door open is direction, not every door closed means you've lost what's yours. Hence, discernment must walk together with faith. Another sign of growth is when opportunity requires you to develop something that you do not yet possess completely. You need to learn to organize, take responsibility, improve your communication, have more discipline, leave the comfort zone. This might scare you, but there's a difference between an opportunity that challenges you to grow up and a situation that requires you to abandon who you are to stay in it. Growth expands its maturity. Excitement can simply fuel your need for novelty. So ask me, would I still want this after the initial emotion went down? This question is powerful, because some opportunities seem irresistible during enthusiasm, which completely lose meaning when you start thinking about the consequences. Others continue to make sense even after emotion decreases. You can do it.

see the challenges and still recognize value in that? This may indicate that there is something more consistent behind enthusiasm. Also note the fruits: Does this opportunity bring you closer to a more coherent life, brings responsibility, strengthens your ability to fulfill what you promise, contributes to your goals, respects your limits, or just offers an escape from what you are living now? Because you're not looking for an opportunity, you're just looking for a way out and any novelty seems better than staying where we are. Your story is changing just because you're learning not to accept news just because it's new. There's a big difference between learning from the past and using it as a sentence. 76 In that instant, the sky understood what you had broken. It wasn't just a door, it was one of your possible futures. And the strangest part: you yourself had destroyed it, without ritual, without knowing that you were doing anything extraordinary. You performed such a common gesture that no one near you would realize its importance. He pushed a button, put his cell phone aside, and in a place where repairs had never been necessary, something became impossible to restore. The button you pressed wasn't blocking, it wasn't deleting, nor even sending. It was something much less dramatic. You had received a message, a family message, not from the person you're thinking about now. Details change, but the position that message put you in was known. Someone wanted access to a version of you that had existed for years, the one that explains, that solves, that comes back, that turns an uncomfortable conversation into something comfortable for everyone, the one that can be hurt and yet ends up responsible for restoring peace. You read it, your finger went to the keyboard, you knew what you could answer. In fact, I could almost hear the phrases forming in the head: the explanation, the clarification, the words carefully chosen, the message built to make sure no one misinterpreted you. So you stopped, not because you stopped caring. That would have been simpler. You stopped because that whole scene looked old, same position. The other day he looked again at the message which, instead of answering, marked as unread. Just that, no thunder, no revelation, no voice saying you'd passed some test. You put your cell phone away and continued the day. But in heaven, the door cracked. Miguel looked through it and saw what that corridor had always kept: possible continuations. Every important choice creates paths. Some paths lasted seconds, some years. Most disappeared silently when another path was chosen. That was normal: someone turns left instead of right, takes a job, refuses another, answers a call, loses a bus, says yes, says no, one possibility closes, another is born, nothing breaks. But your door hadn't just closed, there was a piece missing. Michael called the angels. Their function was simple: when a human future became unstable, they repaired the passage around it. A misunderstanding could be corrected, a delayed decision could be resumed, a relationship could change, a mistake could be repaired, even a terrible choice could give rise to another choice afterwards. A human being was almost never bound to a single painting. There was usually still another movement. One of the angels put his hand on the crack, light went through the wall, nothing happened, another tried, the opening remained, so everyone retreated. One sentence came up above the door: Repair requires original material. Miguel looked back through the opening. The missing material was not in heaven, it was in its past. So he went after him, hoped to find some extraordinary event. Between that, he found you at 17, in a kitchen. Someone was angry, you said something real. The environment got heavy and immediately began to soften what he had said, explained what he meant, explained what he did not want to say, tried to fix other people's reaction to their honesty. One small fragment got rid of you, Miguel followed another. You were older, somewhere else, someone had let you down. There were reasons to leave, but you stayed long enough to explain why it had hurt and stayed even more when the person got angry because you were hurt. Another fragment, another year. You wrote a message at dawn, erased, wrote again, changed words so that the other person would not feel accused of the consequences of what she had done herself. Different faces, same movement. Something happens, you feel, you try to explain and then you start managing everyone's reaction to what you felt. Miguel went back to the door. Now I knew where the original stuff had gone. It had been built on an old deal, not a deal you remembered making. Something learned by repetition: if something breaks between you and someone else, it is your responsibility to make everything safe again. This agreement had produced thousands of futures. Details changed, fate was the same. You would return to the known position, restore access. Only that night, when you marked the message as unread, something new happened. You didn't punch anybody, you didn't become a cold person, you didn't write one last badass explaining why you'd never explain anything again. Just delayed the old answer long enough for a question to appear: Do I really want to get into this again? The question came to heaven before the answer, and the door broke. Because the future behind her depended on you never asking that question. The angels rebuilt all the answers you could have sent. In one, you explained yourself, in another you apologized for the tone, in another you returned because silence provoked guilt, in another you exploded, said everything, repented and then returned to repair the damage. Different roads, same room. Then Miguel realized: all those futures were still possible, except one: the future in which you would never find out you could choose, that had completely disappeared. This is what the broken door represented: not a lost opportunity, a lost inevitability. Michael turned to the angels: fix it. They tried. The fragment in his hand darkened even more: notice the impossible. Then Michael took him to a deeper region of heaven, passed through places where human prayers had names, passed through records of choices that had changed whole families, until he reached the place where nothing was restored, before it was known exactly what that repair would bring back. There the fragment was placed before God. For a few moments nothing happened. Then the black surface became transparent, your room appeared in it, the cell phone, the message, your hand, the few seconds of silence before you put it aside. God once observed, then another. Miguel waited until one sentence appeared: it cannot be fixed. Miguel asked the obvious question: Why? The answer had no relation to lack of power, it was a contradiction. To restore that door, the sky would need to restore the future in which you still didn't know you had a choice. Only now you knew. Even if I did answer tomorrow, I'd respond knowing I could refuse. Even if I did, I'd come back knowing I could leave. Even if you apologized, you would know that the request was a choice, not a tax charged automatically for having needs. That ancient future depended on ignorance and there is no way to return that ignorance without taking from you what you have already learned. That's why heaven couldn't fix it, because fixing the door would require breaking you down. But there's an important part here: finding out you can choose doesn't mean you'll always choose right. Three days later another situation appeared, another person, same pressure and this time you fell right into the old pattern:

explained too much, responded too quickly, spent almost an hour rewriting a message that should have taken a few minutes. After sending it, he realized exactly what he had done. For a few moments he thought that the door had returned to normal, that nothing had changed, that that night was just an exception. Maybe you were still the same person. In heaven, Miguel returned to the hall. The door was still broken. No piece had returned. So he watched what you would do. You reread the conversation, looked at your own messages and said below: I did it again, without destroying myself for it, without dramatically swearing that I would never repeat it again. Then came another sentence: but I don't have to go on just because I started. And you stopped. That was new. The sky discovered the difference between repeating a pattern and becoming blind to it again. The behavior had returned. Not blindness. The door remained broken and this changed the investigation. Miguel went down the hall. Another door was cracked. Behind it, a future where you stayed somewhere just for leaving, would disappoint someone. Another, a future in which he accepted disrespect because the other person had also suffered. Another, a future where you spent years trying to prove your worth to someone determined not to recognize you. Nothing was attacking the sky, you were doing something on Earth, something almost ridiculously small. He started asking a question before he automatically returned to the old position. Sometimes: is that really mine to fix? Other times: am I helping or am I afraid of what happens if I don't help? And sometimes there was no question. You simply felt a known impulse and waited. That pause was enough, because the old mechanism needed speed, needed you to act before you could separate reflex responsibility. The moment they believed the damage was connected to the conflict, until something good happened. Someone complimented you. You finally got the recognition you wanted and another door broke down. That was different. Golden lines crossed its surface. Miguel looked inside, behind her there was a future in which you spent years trying to recreate that moment: more achievements, more numbers, more approval, more proof. Not because success was bad, but because you needed the next success to confirm that the previous one had been real. Later that same night, you caught yourself checking again. The number was still rising, the tension was still there. For a few minutes, the old machine began to rebuild around something new. So you closed the screen. Not because success didn't matter; you just refused to make tomorrow prove that today was worth it. The golden door broke and Michael finally understood: you were not destroying just a habit; you were breaking a law that the past had written within you. The next moment needs to validate the previous. If anyone loved you, they needed to keep proving it. If you were successful, you needed to win again. If you set a line, everyone had to agree he was fair. If it was evolving, it couldn't fall back. If you made a good decision, the result needed to reward you. Otherwise, the choice seemed invalid. A name arose on the broken doors: continuity debt. The debt that says that every good choice needs to be justified by what happens after, that makes you reopen a door because closing it hurt, abandoning a limit because you felt guilty, turning an old behavior into proof that all your progress was false. Heaven was not watching you become a person full of certainties; I was seeing you rely less on it after choosing. Then came the test that really mattered: you made a decision and regretted it. A real mistake, no hidden victory, no spiritual excuse. The consequences have come. You wished you had chosen different. Miguel waited. If the theory was wrong, the doors should start rebuilding. They didn't.

You corrected what you still could, apologized where you owed an apology, changed what you could still change, accepted what you no longer gave and continued. A new crack crossed the hall. This time, Michael didn't call the angels. Now he understood: what he had broken was not his ability to return to the past; it was his need to change the past before moving on. That's why even God couldn't fix it. There was nothing to repair without undoing reality. God didn't have to turn true choices into false choices, just to preserve an old version of you. That seems to say the sky has failed. It wasn't that. Heaven lost a future that depended on you remaining unconscious. This future did not survive the moment it was seen and, after you saw it, no power could make you miss that and still leave the choice to be yours. This is not divine weakness; it is the consequence that something has become real. Some choices can be corrected, some deserve excuses, others can be reviewed, but none can stop happening. Maturity begins when you stop demanding that the cure deliver a past where nothing happened. What you can build is a future where what happened doesn't get the final vote. Miguel went back to the first door. The piece was still missing. He looked through the opening. His room was gone. Now I saw you before another door, a royal door. There was someone on the other side, someone important to you and that's why the decision was difficult. The person asked for something. A part of you wanted to say yes right away. Another wanted to say no just to prove he could. No answer seemed clean. So you did something your old version would hardly bear: I said I need to think and left. Miguel watched. No celestial explosion, no new crack, nothing extraordinary, until you realize why. For the first time several futures could stay alive long enough for you to really choose. That's what existed beyond the corridor.

broken: not empty, possibility. One door led to stay, another to leave. One to forgive, one to refuse. One trying again, one recognizing it's over. And none of them opened themselves. Miguel took the black fragment again. The phrase had changed. This future can't happen anymore. Now he said this future can no longer happen without his consent. That was the real damage. You're already getting his signals. Not mystic signs, behavioral signs. You get a message and you don't respond while your emotions are screaming, you realize that you're writing the fourth paragraph of an explanation and you erase two, you say yes, you realize that you responded out of fear and come back to correct, you say no and you cross the blame without treating it as proof that you were wrong, you miss without turning homesickness into order to come back, you make a mistake without using it to erase months of progress, you get recognition without immediately needing to guarantee the next dose. He notices an older pattern earlier and earlier: first, a week later, then in the middle, until the day comes when he realizes when his finger is still on the button. That's not perfection, that's visibility. And when a pattern becomes visible, it loses the right to pretend it's inevitable. That's why you also need to be careful even with the chosen identity, because it can also turn to another door. If being chosen means that you must always be wiser, always stronger, always more spiritually evolved, then your identity begins to require the next moment to prove the former. You make a mistake once and you panic, you feel common and you think you've lost something, you need help and you start to wonder if you've ever been strong. It is the same old law in sacred clothing: the next moment should not validate the previous. You can have a powerful perception today and be confused tomorrow, can grow and still repeat something, can become wiser and continue to need correction. The goal is not to build a version of you that never changes again. That would just be Another prison with better lighting. The goal is to become someone who can perceive, choose, correct and continue. That's the system. Notice what's really going on. Separate what belongs to this moment and what is coming from an ancient moment. choice, which action makes sense now? Review what reality taught after choice. Correct, if new information changes the answer, change the answer. Go on. Do not turn correction into proof that the whole walk was false. That's how a broken door becomes useful, not because you can never enter the old pattern again, but because he can't close the door behind you anymore and pretend there was never a way out.

What seemed common was never the measure.

1 It's never been a complaint. It's a celebration. There was a letter on that table that no one should see. There was no king, no queen, no number, no suit, just the black verse, crossed by a thin blue line. For nine rounds, the man running the game kept that card hidden under his left hand. Nobody asked about her. That was part of the game. Around the table were six people who spent years studying how you behave when something important is at risk. They didn't gamble money. They bet decisions. A photograph was positioned in the center of the table, yours. Next to her, a situation has been presented. Someone from your past gets in touch again. This person knows exactly what to say, does not really apologize, does not fully assume what he did, but offers enough heat to reopen a door that you have already tried to close. The players began to download their cards. He'll answer. He'll explain himself. He'll expect proof. He'll be back. The man in front of the table said nothing. So your phone lit up. The real one. A few miles from that table, you read a message, you looked at it for a few seconds and you did something none of the six had bet on. Turned his phone down and went back to what he was doing. The man's hand moved. The secret letter had changed. Now there was a name on it. Yours. One of the players got up so fast that the chair hit the ground. Who put that there? No one answered. The man turned the letter. ? The other ?

side there was only one sentence. He's not playing the part anymore. That's when the game stopped. Because for years they were not predicting their future. They were predicting your position and you had just left it empty. The strange thing wasn't you ignoring a message. Anyone can do that. The weird thing was that everyone at that table was so sure you'd answer. They had records. Not mystical records. Standards. Every game started the same way. One person was put under pressure. So the players tried to predict what role she would play within that situation. Some became saviors, others disappeared, some attacked minds that could be rejected, others apologized even before being accused and some spent their lives trying to prove their worth to those who had already decided not to see them. The details changed. The part almost never. And your file looked easy. When tension arose, you were trying to understand. When someone walked away, they looked for a reason. When a conversation got confusing, you added more words. When someone didn't understand you, they tried to explain themselves better. And when something ended without a conclusion, a part of you kept the case open. Players had a name for their position: the finalizer. Not because you shut things down, but because you hated leaving them unfinished. You wanted the last conversation, the missing explanation, that phrase that would finally make them both understand what had happened. Sometimes that impulse made you careful. Other times it made you stay in situations long after all that could still be resolved, it's over. The table didn't care about the difference. I just needed to know if your role was still predictable. And for a long time it went on. The man opened his record in old rounds. Once, after an argument, the other person left. You went after it just to explain one more thing. On another occasion, a friendship changed and you spent weeks

Gathering signals before accepting something I already felt. Then someone treated you badly. You left. Two days later he sent that huge message explaining exactly why. Different scenes, same position. The game didn't have to predict his words. All you had to do was know what role you believed to be obliged to occupy. Then came the night of the secret letter. The message came up. The old gear started immediately. You read it once, then another. He's already started putting the answer to his head. That family pressure came up, so fix it. Just another thought interrupted everything. What if it doesn't have to be solved today? It was a small question. At that table, it was a catastrophe, because all the cards placed depended on urgency. Answer now, understand now, decide now, fix now, find out what that means now. His old role survived turning uncertainty into an emergency. And you had just allowed something unfinished to remain unfinished. The man looked at the secret letter again. A second sentence appeared: empty slot. A player protested. He'll answer tomorrow. Maybe. That wasn't the problem. The problem was that tomorrow's answer could no longer be foreseen by yesterday's role. So they waited. The next morning, you opened the message again. He still cared. I still had questions. You had not become magically indifferent, but the emotional temperature had changed and realized something you did not see the night before. The message didn't even ask a question. She created an opening and left you the responsibility to cross it. Your old version would have completed the missing part. Not this time. You closed the conversation. The player who bet he will answer lost the round, but the other smiled. So you're getting evasive. The man looked at him. Bet on it. He bet. Three days later another situation appeared. Someone else, another context. Someone important asked if there was something wrong between you two. Now being silent would be easier. If that player was right, you

I'd go back again. Only you responded, directly, without punishment, without disappearing. He said what was bothering him, asked a question and heard the answer. The letter of evasion lost too. The table was silent. You ignored one message and answered another. Opposite behavior in the same week, players hated that. Predictable people are easy to summarize with verbs. He stays, he goes away, forgives, fights, explains, disappears. But his decisions were no longer being organized around a single verb. The man wrote something about your photograph. Context before paper. That was the first rule changed by the secret letter. Until then the players asked: What does this person usually do? The letter forced everyone to ask a better question: What does this moment really require? And that question revealed something uncomfortable. A pattern can start as a protection and end as an identity. Explaining saved a relationship that was really worth it. Being useful often brought security into a chaotic house. Learning to read the environment helped you avoid conflict when you were younger. Keeping calm prevented another person's emotions from becoming dangerous. An answer works. So you keep using it. The years pass. The environment changes. The answer stays, until you stop saying: That's how I learned to act and start saying, That's who I am. That's where a strategy becomes a part. And roles are powerful because they start making decisions before the moment comes. The table never had to control you. It was enough to know which version of yourself you felt obliged to protect: the understanding, the strong, the forgiving, the independent, the one who never needs anyone, who never gives up, who always gives one more chance. Choose any identity. Sooner or later, life finds a way to hold her like a handle. Right now. A player who hasn't gambled yet. He watched all the rounds quietly. So you put a face down next to your picture. The man asked: What's your bet? She replied that now he needs to be different. No one understands. She turned the letter. He'll reject your old version. It was a smart bet, because when someone finally recognizes a pattern, they often build a second prison, trying to prove that they escaped from the first. If you were chasing people before, now you can never look for anyone. If you explained too much, now you must always be silent. If you forgive too quickly, now no one gets another chance. If you needed approval, now caring about any opinion seems weak. The old paper disappears, a reaction against it takes over and the table predicts you again. So they prepared a perfect test. Someone from your past contacted you. It was not the person of the first message, it was another one and this time there was something lacking before: responsibility. No vague nostalgia, no bait. The person clearly said what he had done, did not demand forgiveness, did not ask you to pretend that nothing happened, just wrote: I understand if you don't want to answer, but I needed to say it clearly. The silent player leaned back, thought she had won. If your new identity was "I never come back," you'd reject it. But he meant well. The person who would never do that on purpose? All this was true. It wasn't the first thing that needed to be said either. So you said: What I said was wrong and it wasn't fair to you, without but, without immediate explanation. You let the phrase exist alone. The table lost four bets at the same time, so something even more important happened. The other person didn't forgive you immediately. She was still hurt. His old version would try to buy quick relief, more words, more excuses, a demand disguised as repair. Please stop being hurt so I can know I'm still a good person. This time you did what you could and allowed the other person to have their own time. The secret letter changed again. Responsibility without erasing. The man kept looking at it. It's not what I expected. Him

Figured leaving papers would make you take less responsibility. The opposite happened. You didn't have to turn into a bad person to admit a bad attitude. Nor did he have to remain the good person denying what he had done. I could correct an action without turning a single moment into an identity. That changed the table. The game has always depended on people defending characters. The loyal one who needs to stay, the strong one who can't ask for help, the victim who can't admit when he hurts someone, the healer who believes he has no right to anger. When the character becomes sacred, reality becomes an enemy, whenever it contradicts the script. The secret letter didn't give you a better character. She allowed you to stop auditioning to get a part. That's why it changed everything and that's when the letter started causing problems beyond your file. The players looked at their own cards. A man specializing in predicting abandonment realized that he always left first. A woman capable of identifying pride in others hadn't spoken to her own sister in six years. Then the man in front of the table turned his letter. The observer. He spent years believing that seeing everyone's standards would put him out of the game. I wouldn't. Distance was just his role. Your letter didn't make you impossible to predict. She forced those who studied papers to see their own. For the first time during a round the man got up and left. No one stopped him. Ten minutes later he came back without a jacket. So you removed the black box where the secret letter was kept. Inside it were hundreds of blank letters. The players were watching. How many people have one? He answered: all of them. That changed the room. Your letter wasn't hidden because you were the only person who could change. It was hidden because the game had no use from a person who has not yet received a role. A prediction needs a pattern. A role needs repetition. A table built on certainty not can use the instant someone pauses long enough to choose again. The blank cards were always there. No one distributed them. Until yours showed up alone. Now the players understood why his name mattered. You had not been selected as the only free being in a world of programmed people. It just made the letter that nobody used visible. And that was the dangerous part. Because if everyone had a blank card, you couldn't build another identity around waiting for the exception. Even chosen could become another role if it made you treat every feeling as proof, every opposition as confirmation and every correction as a threat. The secret letter required something more difficult. Can you get a powerful idea without turning it into a prison? Can you feel yourself without needing every sentence to feed your ego? Can you recognize a pattern and still allow the facts to correct your interpretation? You can be proud of your growth without pretending you've just grown up. That's where authorship begins. Separate your decisions from fear, pressure, guilt, inherited reactions and identities that try to choose before you. The papers, the victories, the mistakes, even the secret letter with your name on it. For the first time, no one bet. He dealt a face down card to every person on the table. Turn around. Everyone turned around. Every card was empty, except yours. His name was still there, but he's not doing the paper anymore. Empty position, too. Just like all the other phrases that came up later. There was only one left. Ask me again. The players waited for an explanation. She didn't come. Then one last scene appeared on your record. Someone asked for a favor. Your first impulse was to say yes. You stopped, realized you really had time and said yes. Another request came up on a day when I was exhausted. You said no. Someone criticized you. You heard enough to keep what was useful and reject the rest. You missed someone without turning homesick into order. Failed to something without putting your entire identity on trial. Nothing supernatural happened. That was the point. The letter didn't eliminate your standards. She helped you realize when a pattern was passing for decision. The man finally wrote the method on the table. Note: what came first, the moment or the paper? Name it. What version of you are trying to take control? What fixes everything? What runs away? What do you need to prove? The judge? The savior? Do you? What is really true in this situation? Choose. What answer belongs to this moment and not to the reputation you try to maintain before yourself? Watch. What happened after your choice? Revise. If reality teaches you something new, use it without shame. The man took a step back. That was the whole system. Not a perfect instinct. Not permanent indifference. Not become impossible to manipulate. A space small enough to go unnoticed, big enough to change a life. Space between. That's what I always do. And what makes sense now? That's what your secret letter meant. This changes the meaning of the game. They put your name on a letter. At first it seemed like proof that you had been chosen in secret. It wasn't. Your name came up because that table couldn't fit you perfectly into the paper you had predicted. Then the card changed the game because it revealed something that the players ignored for years. A person is not just the sum of his repetitions. There is also a moment when she perceives repetition. The moment you interrupt. The moment you repeat it again, but you see it in the middle. The moment you discover that always doing the opposite does not mean freedom either. The moment new information arises and it reviews. That's the part that no fixed card can keep. The man took his letter one last time, looked at his name, then at the empty cards around the table and tore his in half. Everyone's up. Why destroy it? He put the pieces on the table.

Because the moment we preserve this letter, we will give him another role to protect. No one argued. He tore it up again. Then again until your name can no longer be read. The letter that had changed everything disappeared, but something else changed along with it. Nobody at that table wanted their old letter back. The man marked as the observer turned his down. The woman who had bet on his rebellion did the same. One by one all the papers disappeared from the table. Not because the patterns were gone, but because no one else treated them like sentences. The man gathered the deck. Before he kept it, he wrote a phrase on the lid: A pattern might explain your last move. He doesn't own the next one. That's what changed everything. The goal was never to become unpredictable. It was authorship. Allow your story to inform you without letting it divert you from the order, allow an identity to help without giving her your next decision. And that's precisely why the letter had to remain hidden until now. If you'd seen her before, you'd probably turn her into another title, another performance, another version of yourself you'd need to support. But you didn't reveal that letter becoming extraordinary. He revealed in ordinary moments, a message he did not immediately respond to, a conversation he decided to have, an apology he accepted without reopening a door, a mistake he admitted without turning into his own mistake, a yes that really was yes, a no that did not need a defense in a court of law, small movements, different roles, a growing capacity. Ask again. So the next time an old version of you arrives before the moment is over, remember the only sentence left in that letter: Nope. Never come back. Neither. Always choose you. Neither. Trust everything you feel. Neither. Be stronger than anyone expected. Just ask me again: What's true now? What belongs to this moment? What I'm choosing because it really does sense here? And what am I choosing because I'm afraid of becoming someone different from the character I know? The secret letter never gave the answer. That's exactly why it mattered. She returned the question to you, and when the question really belongs to you, that table can still study your past, can still recognize your habits, can still make predictions. Sometimes you'll get it right, but you can't confuse pattern with order anymore, and neither should you. Your name was never put in that letter to tell me who you are. It was put there to mark the moment when you agreed to ask who needs to be this time. And that changes everything. 3 That's what you're feeling, it's a thousand-year-old curse falling all over the land. If the ritual fails he comes back hungry. 4 Now comes the part that will change the way you see your whole story. The devil has summoned the seven princes of hell for an extraordinary session. The theme of the meeting was a single question: what do we do with a soul that transforms everything we throw against it into force against us? Asmodeu, the specialist in breaking relationships, admitted: ?I tried countless times. Each relationship destroyed only refined his discernment. Now he identifies my traps before I even finish setting them.? Beelzebub, who works with despair, confessed: ?All the dark moments I induced were transmuted. He uses memory of the past as motivation, not anchor.? Mamom, responsible for greed, reported: ?I offered financial shortcuts that would compromise your integrity. He rejected them all. He prefers to build slowly and cleanly to build quickly and dirtyly.? Leviathan, master of envy, admitted: ?I tried to make him compare himself to others to feel inferior. He genuinely celebrates the success of others. I cannot find entry through envy.?

Satan, who acts through pride, said: "I tried to inflate it after his conquests to create an exploitable arrogance. He attributes the victories to greater forces and remains humble." Belial, an expert in worthlessness, confessed: "In the lowest moments, I tried to convince him that nothing mattered. He always finds something small that is worth going on with." And Lucifer, the devil himself, after hearing all the reports, made a statement that silenced hell: "This soul operates in a system that we can't even get into. She can't resist our attacks; she metabolizes them. The more we attack, the stronger it becomes. We are literally feeding our own enemy." So he made an unprecedented decision: you declared a specimen protected for observation, not out of kindness, but out of distorted scientific curiosity. He wants to understand how you work. He wants to find out the secret of his transmutation capability. He wants to decipher the code that allows you to turn poison into vitamin. And to study him properly, he needs you to keep existing, and you, evolving. Attacking him now would be counterproductive for his purpose. Then he ordered all hellish hierarchies to keep their distance: no interference, no temptation, no attack, just silent observation. You've become so fascinating to the devil that he'd rather study you than destroy you. But here's what the devil didn't calculate: God was watching that whole meeting. And while the devil saw in you a scientific puzzle to be deciphered, God saw something completely different: the confirmation of the divine design that He initiated long ago. Let me reveal something about your existence that you never knew: you were not born by accident. Its specific combination of characteristics was designed intentionally. You are a divine project of something that God has been developing for ages.

5 No blow this time, Lula. Last time we missed it, but this time there's a laser from the space pointed at your head. 6 Note: I'm not stuck here with you, you're stuck with me here. What got in my way for a long time was thinking it was on average. That everyone felt something like it. Talk to God, guys, he answers and delegates. Put yourselves on the test all the time.

DEDICATION

I dedicate these words to my God, powerful and the sole holder of all honor, glory and power yesterday, today and forever. To my family, who despite all the obstacles in life have always been by my side. To no one else, only to the first divine messenger who appears and reappears in the consciousness of people who love each other. But love is the mixture of divine joy and longing in which people always need each other. God is father and mother, He who knows our difficulties; we are imperfect creatures by design, and that is the proof of the eternal love of our creator.
